FOUNDED, A.D. 1821C THE GREAT PIONEER FAMILY PAPER OF AMERICA.

Vol. 67.

PUBLICATION OFFICE

PHILADELPHIA SATURDAY, MARCH 10, 1888.

PIVE CENTS A COPY.

No. 35

OVER THE HILLS AND FAR AWAY.

BY BRINTON

"Over the lills and far away, " You think is where you would like to be, Beyond the dulness of every day-Beyond the rim of monotony Free and unbounded to skim and soar, Far and unfettered to fleet and fly, Where the clouds are slivered for evermore, And the soul can float in a golden sky.

"Over the hills" - but, fond heart, mind You take yourself with you all the way; You cannot sever or leave behind The ache that is aching every day-The ruffled spirit, the broken will,
The throbbing feeling, the smitten pride;
And the clouds will be lined with sliver still; No one ever looked on the other side

From Out the Storm.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DICK'S SWEET-HEART," ETC.

CHAPTER XII.

I E stared at her for some moments in undisguised amazement, hardly knowing what to say or think; and then suddenly the meaning of her words struck him. If he were to marry her!

The events of the past few weeks recurred to him, and swiftly, in imagination, he passed again through the scenes that he would have been only too glad to forget. First he saw the pale beautiful face of Lady Mary calmly and serenely awaiting the approach of death. Again he heard her entreating him in gentle accents to befriend the lonely child she had loved and reared, while her face was upturned to him with a look of ineflable love in her soft, pleading eyes. And then there came before him that other face, with an expression of fiendish mockery, and the beautiful eyes, as the lips he had once kissed proclaimed to him that solution of the problem which so perplexed him.

Marry her-such was the advice given to him. Well, how if he obeyed her in this, as he had in all things during their brief acquaintance? His heart beat with a fierce joy as he thought of how she would look when she first heard of it. To be so soon forgotten-that would touch her, the more so as she had always been jealous of the child. It would be a sweet revenge.

Why, if he hastened matters, he might so as to be married before her should not think of him for long as a despondent lover wounded to death; she should see the announcement of his marriage, tue actual accomplished fact, in all the newspapers, as he had seen that on dit about hers that morning.

Then he became calmer, as his thoughts went back again to Lady Mary, and he remembered his promise to her How could he better fulfil that promise than in this strange way that Marvel in her innocence had presented to him? She would have the sure protection of his name, and at his death everything that he possessed would be hers.

As for the chid herself, it was her own wish; and she would certainly fret and pine away it left alone in the huge silent house. And he would be her friend for life-that he swore to himself. She should be first with him in all things-at least such things over which he had power; to love again as he had-nay, as he did love (he would at all events be honest with himself)-was beyond him. By adopting this Plan all fears for her future would be at an end.

It helped him too in his growing decision to know that Lady Mary, if living, would have given her sanction to the match. Some words of hers recurred to him, and he repeated them over and over again to himself:

"Enveloped in mystery as is her birth, I should, nevertheless, look upon the man who wins her heart as a very fortunate in-

He looked suddenly at Marvel, and the sight of her hastened his decision; she was sitting on a low seat, her head drooping, her fingers interlaced, with an expression of deepest melancholy upon her childish tace. He went over to her, and, leaning upon the back of her chair, said deliberately:

"You think if I were to-that is, if you were to marry me, it would arrange matters and make you happier? So be it then?" She drew her breath quickly, but said nothing.

"Will you?" he asked.

"Would it"-raising her anxious eyes to his-"would it mean that you would take me with you when you go abroad for ever?"

"Certainly. That is exactly what it would mean"—no more he thought. "Then I will," she said solemnly.

She looked at him earnestly, and, as she looked, the grave expression on her face died away, and a smile began to part her lips. A moment later the last remnant of her grief and fear had vanished as a snowflake melts before the embrace of the warm sun.

"Is it true? Is it real?" she cried. "Shall I indeed go with you? Ob, Fulke, when you spoke of going for ever, my heart felt as if it must break! And it would have broken; I could not have lived on here alone-I should have died! I have no one -no one but you; and now I shall have you always-always-oh!"

She ran to him in a little ecstasy of delight, threw her arms around him, and gave him a grateful hug.

"And there is one thing," she went on presently, leaning back from him the better to look into his face and mark the effect of her words-"I sha'n't be a bit of trouble to you-not a bit-you shall see! I'll be as good as gold, and never in the way."

"Do you think you can be ready in a asked he, filled now with his own desire to quit England and the woman who had deceived him. "At once, I mean in a real hurry? Could you"-with some hesitation, feeting uncertain as to how she would take it-"could you marry me, say, to-morrow?"

"This minute, if you like," she said heartily. "What is there to prevent it?"

Such a joyous accession to his wishes astonished him more than anything Marvel had yet said. In such a hurry to be made a countess! But as he looked at her he knew that he wronged her, and that no mercenary or ambitious thought could enter her head.

"What, indeed?" he said, and then suddenly burst out laughing, for, in spite of himself, he could not help it.

Was there ever such a strange wooingsuch a strange child? A child of seventeen. The people of his world would laugh if he described her to them-she had laughed! His brow darkened again as he remembered

"Still, we may as well give ourselves time to look about us," he said, "and arrange our affairs, and put them in order: and, whether we like it or not"-with another smile-"we shall have to wait for the yacht to come round here before we can start for our voyage round the world."

"Is it in the yacht we shall go?" she said, opening wide her delighted eyes.

"Yes; there is nothing like the sea; and, when once you are accustomed to it, and have had time to forget the first unpleasant feeling, you-

"Oh; I know all about it!" she interrupted contemptuously, with a disdainful toss of the head. "Did you think I was a landcrab entirely? I know everything about the sea except"-with emphasis -"the ununpleasantness. I am never sea-sick"with a glance that implied her belief that he was sometimes, or else he would not know so much about it. "The Rector and I used to go out together very often last autumn; and one day, when there was a terrible sea on, and when every one-even the sailorswas a bit squeamish, and the poor rector was quite dreadfully ill, l"-proudly-"felt nothing but the sweet touch of the salt spray on my face, as the water washed right over me."

"That's right! Then you will enjoy yourself."

"And what clothes shall I take, Fulkemy winter ones, or my summer? It winter, I shall have to buy some, because I have nothing warm-that is"-with a sudden change to gravity-"in mourning. Shall we be going to cold places or to hot ones?"

"Both, in all probability; so bring all you can, and we can buy the others on our journey. I don't know myself where we are bound for-we shall wander away out into the world like two outcasts-anywhere and everywhere."

"It is like a fairy-tale," she said, in a hushed tone. "Oh, dear, darling Fulke, how kind of you to take me with you! And where shall we go?"

"Wherever our fancy guides us." "'Our'? Shall I have a choice then?"

"The first if you wish it; so now decide." "Athens?" she questioned, with an eager glance at him. "I have longed all my life to see Athens." "Like all longings," he said slowly, "it will end in disappointment. The Athens of your dreams is, I imagine, very different from the Athens you will see when wide awake; however, one must be freed from illusions sooner or later. Begin with Athens; it will hurt you less, believe me, than the awakenings farther on in life's voyage," "You speak sadly," she rejoined. "I shall not like to go to Athens it you don't. Name some other place."

"All places are alike to me-no, Athens let it be. At all events, the Mediterranean will not disappoint you. And now run away; there is much to be done-a special license to be procured."

"What's that?" she asked.

a permit from her Majesty for our espousals!"

She did not see that he was laughing, and she grew quite solemn over the thought of her nuptials. It occurred to her, en passant, that the Queen must have a busy time of it, it she had to give leave to everybody who wanted to get married.

"You see it is a very important step you are about to take," continued Wriothesley, whose humor this morning was decidedly saturnine, so it was no wonder she did not grasp it. "I have to write an order to the skipper that he bring round the yacht, and see that it is properly victualled. There are several ladies' cabins on board, tolerably comfortable, so you need not worry about that. It will also be necessary to say a word or two to the rector; a little packing, I suppose, and then hey for your dilapidated Athens!"

He spoke as lightly as he could, for his brain seemed to be burning. She ran off to the door, bent on obeying him, though she would have dearly liked to stay and discuss the details of their voyage; but, when she reacted the door, she paused, hesitated, and finally came back to him, rubbing her foretinger very slowly, in a pretty embarrassed fashion, across her rosy

"Fulke," she said shamefacedly, not daring to look at him, "you-you won't change your mind when I am gone, will you? If

She stopped abruptly.

"I shall not change my mind," he said; but go on-what was that 'if' about?"

"If I thought you would, I should stay here"-naively.

"Be happy-I sha'n't!" he replied. She went once more towards the door, and, having reached it, once more turned back. This time she came quite close to him, and slipped her cool slender tingers into his. "Tell me," she said-"do husbands ever leave their wives? Can they?" Was there ever so perplexing a child? Again he felt that strong inclination to laugh, but this time he suppressed it-she was looking to serious.

"Never!" he said, in so positive and emphatic a tone that she was satisfied.

She pondered his answer, however, for a moment or two, and then uttered a little exclamation of perfect content, and stirred her fingers in his, as if to remove them and go; but Wriothesley tightened his grasp on them, and so detained her.

"But," said he, "wives have been known to leave their husbands!"

He hardly knew why he said this, but he could not resist the desire to see how she would look when she heard it. If he expected an indignant disclaimer, however, he was disappointed.

"Have they? Why?" demanded she, with the utmost astonishment, but quite calmly, accepting what he had just said as loyally as she had the answer to her ques-

"Who shall say?" returned he, not feeling equal to an explanation and, therefore, carefully avoiding it.

"Oh, it is too foolish!" she said at last. "I am sure you mean what you say, Fulke: but I think somebody has been deceiving you. After all, I dont believe a word of it 'tis a story. Just fancy my leaving you?"

Mr. Bainbridge, the rector, was a tall, gaunt old man whose handsome head, although it was bowed down with age and study, was plentifully sprinkled with gray hairs. He had keen eyes and a strong mouth, which at times could be stern; and he walked with a staff. He was older even than he looked, and he had served his Master faithfully so long a time in this world that he believed himself to be standing alof the next: be and strong, nowever, in body, if rather tired in spirit. The turmoils of life and the loss of many friends had wearied him; and this last irreparable loss-the death of Lady Mary, who had been more to him than most-had given him an ever-growing desire to wing his way to that land where partings are unknown.

As Lord Wriothesley entered the cool study where the old man sat, the rector looked up at him with a prolonged stare of astonishment.

"Home again!" he said, when he had shaken hands with the young man, "I thought you were far from this, and was pleased to think so. I heard yesterday that you had returned to town, and I thought you would have remained there. The monotony of this calm country life can hardly be to the taste of a young man like you."

"You are thinking about Marvel," said Wriothesley simply, brushing aside the veil behind which the elder man would have hidden his real meaning-"so am 1. What is to become of her is a question that has troubled me for many a day; but now I think I have found an answer to it. I am going abroad for a considerable time, and I am going to marry Marvel and take her

errow's discords I have known Ehythmic grow at touch of time; What was once a piteous groan Helps to make a dainty rhyme

Rocks that one time harred my way. Thorns that tore me as I passed, een by light of dying day, Make a picture at the last

Say not in this life of mine, This was grievous, that was wrong; Sorrow, by a law divine, Is the chosen seed of song.

True it is the griefs were great rue it is the songs are small; Yet the verses compensate For the troubles after all

Tones that seem too harsh to day Make lile's harmony

IN SEVERED PATHS

BY THE AUTHOR OF "PENKIVEL," "OLIVE

VARCOE," "WITH THIS RING

I WED THEE," RTC.

CHAPTER LIL

'ITHIN the cave the light penetrated for some little distance, and the flare of crimson in the sky cast a red streak across the white glistening sand which paved the cavern.

To look back was to behold the glory of sun and sky framed like a picture by the oark rocky entrance of the cave; to look forward was to meet black darkness at which the eye quivered and recoiled. "You perceive, miss," observed Daniel, "that it would not be safe to stow the casks here—they might be seen from the beach. We must roll them farther on, into the ould place where they used to lie in your father's time."

"Just as you will, Daniel; but we cannot go farther on without a light."

"There used to be an ould lantern kept here somewhere abouts," said Daniel, run-ning his hand up the wall of rock. "Auh, iss, nere he is, and a beauty he be too! But that's nothin' so long as there's a bit of can-die in 'up."

There was; and, since it was made of strong yellow wax, it was in sufficiently good condition to burn.

"I reckon Martin have been in here prying round afore we comed," observed Daniel, as he noted the freshness of the "Now I hope my tinder

He pulled from his pocket a small tin box which held flint, steel, and tinder; and now began the troublesome business of procuring a light, which in the beginning of this great century could only be got by knocking a flint and steel together til sparks fell into the tinder and ignited

Then it had to be blown at with careful breath while a clumsy sulphur-match was held to the slowly-burning tinder.

It was a process to be watched with interand the operator had to give his con centrated attention to it in order to ensure

Thus it happened that, while the ruddy flickering light illumined Daniel's face and threw its glimmer also on Estri d's, neither heard a footfall not far from them; neither saw a form that flitted by swittly in the

The dim light that rose and fell with Daniel's breath made this darkness more intense, while of course rendering them visible to the person passing.

"It's a cranky ould machine," Daniel, holding up the heavy lantern after lighting the candle within it, "but, so the light's good, as our pa'son once said, it don't matter what the outside look of the lantern be that carr's it. Now, my dear, we'll step on, and I'll show ee where they used to stow the kegs in the ould days when the Squires were friendly."

The path tended slightly upwards, but it was not difficult, and they soon reached the place indicated.

Here the ladings of a big ship might be hidden away, and no man's eye be any the

Daniel lifted his lantern on high, the better to show the vastness of the cave. And now the light fell and glimmered on a sur-

ce of water. "How's this?" cried he, in a surprised tone. "It's more'n three years since I was here last, and I disremember of water any was here then or no; but I reckon it You are right-it was not here," Estrild answered. Daniel walked to the edge of the poo which rippled darkly to his feet, and ped his finger in it, then gently touched "It's fresh water," he said, "though a bit brackish; so it's the stream, miss, which have found a new way for itself out

They skirted the pool's edge as its low roof of rocks would permit, and bound this was the case; but the way by which the water came or how it made its way to the sea The overhanging rocks barred further progress except perhaps to a man, who might have dared to climb onwards on hands and knees.

Save for the glimmer on the water where the light fell, the pool lay in black darkness, and there was something awful in its solitude and depth and in the hollow echo of their voices which the rocky roof swept

"Come away!" said Estriid, with a slight shudder. .This is a distrial place—a man might die in it, and his death never be known."

"Tis whisht and oogly," acquiesced Daniel; "and maybe there's rifts too on the rock to hould a dead man; and he might lie there unfound till Doomsday."

So saying, they passed along the verge of the pool, the flosh of the light they carried coming and going in a weird way across its black water, and their lonely tread awak-ing ghostly steps, which seemed to follow stealfully, as that there are vertex. stealthily, as their figures vanished beyond a huge rock. Past this the cavern narrowed, as Harold had found when he explored it; and soon the wall of rock was reached, which had appeared to him to bar all further ingress til he had discovered the ladder which was placed here, and above and beyond which lay that deep gorge in the park where he and Estriid had once met and

At this spot Daniel stopped, saying: "I reckon, miss, you won't be timid now of going on alone?"

Estrild returned; "what is there to No, "Estrild returned; "what is there to ? I know every step of the way. And light from the rent in the rocks above fear? will be enough for me; so you can have the lantern Daniel."

"I won't take it, miss. If you'll light me just past the big rock by the new poothat's all I shall need. The ladder is safe, by the new pool. he added, putting his strong hand upon it, to feel how steady it was; "but you'll timb it the easier for having the lantern handy

Escried did not say no. She turned back with him, both walking slowly, while he spoke regretfully of Martin's impruence in the use to which he had put the Carlew.

'And 'twould grieve me to the heart to he said. "You know ef she's lose her," he said. "You know et she's seized with a contraband cargo aboard she'll be sold, so I'm pewerly thankful to you, Miss Estriid——"

"Don't say a word, Daniel; I owe my life to you. What is this trifle that I do in ren? It is nothing." Well, I promise you, miss,it your goodness saves the Curlew to-night, she shall never run such a risk again. Now I shall never run such a risk again. Now I shail go out to the head of the bay in a fishingboat with a couple of men, and board her if I can come across her: and, ef not, we shall light a signal she'll onderstand. Good night, miss. There's no need to come far-ther; and the side is running in fast, so I must hurry a bit."

He put the lantern in Estrild's hand, and, turning once, smiled, and waved a good-bye as she stood watching him wend his ay into the darkness towards the seatrance of the cave.

As he disappeared her heart fall, and a wavering irresolution unsteaded her thoughts

A sudden impulse to follow Daniel seized her; but she resisted it, remembering that the tide would by this time have covered the sauds, and to return under clift and reach the winding path would be difficult, not impossible.

Daniel was gone to the left, where it was practicable to pass from rock to rock down to Langarth Church-town, but her way would lie to the right, where the waves beat against a wall of rock, so the only road open to her was through the cavern; and, as she had originally decided, she re-solved now again to take it, knowing there was no cause for fear save in the fancies of the wild loneliness and darkness of the

But, while she stood in clouded thought. wavering, many minutes had passed, and she awoke to the consciousness of a deeper volume of sound than usual rolling towards

A thousand wistful echoes gathered round her from the distant hotlows of the cave and these scarce had time to sigh away their voices ere the heat of the next wave recalled them in louder and yet louder rolls of sound.

The noise grew deafening; it was like standing in the midst of uningled thunders or the roar of cannon, and the mighty rush of the reverberations upon the ear con-

As a fugitive in a lost battle, bewildered by the very horror of sound, seeks to fly from the din of raging death, vet runs to the cannon's mouth, so did Estriid now rush forward to the appalling din of the

She was met by a great wave which rolled to her feet, and, dashing up the rocks on either side, scattered its wild spray upon her head, and then fell back upon its bro-ther wave with a long-drawn swell of sound.

The noise of its fall shook the ground; but Estriid, though she started back from its roar, gathered courage from the sight of her danger.

The tide had been on the flow for about three hours, and was now rolling onward with unwonted force, fast filling the cavern with in-rushing death A south-westerly wind, rapidly rising to a storm, harried on the seas, which with dreadful roar neat against the rocky sides and roo, filling the hollows with immeas-

Estrild knew she must hasten now to retrace her steps to safety, so she turned from the din that confused her senses, and set her face against the darkness.

host, but as she went onwards it subsided into dull echoes and fell at last softly into silence. She breathed again now more calmly, and her self-possession and courage returned to her. So she walked on with steady step, smiling to herself at her own tears; but sud-denly her foot touched water, and she recoiled with a shock of amazed bewilder-

Had she taken a wrong turning, or what had happened? She held the lantern low to examine the path, and the flash of its light touched the surface of a heaving

In an instant she perceived the truth. The stream without, swelled by the sudden storm, had increased the water of the pool, which was now spreading over the rocky way which led to the ladder.

But it was not deep; in a minute she had passed through it and stood on the other passed through it and stood on the other side, and turned and looked down the wa-

It had grown so large that it gave her a little chill of fear; and her reflection in the water, as it rippled to her feet, had the look of a ghost standing desolate on the border of outer darkness—so faint, so wan did the image appear to her, as she watched it vanshe moved away.

At this instant, when her heart was sinking, she fancied the sound of a step fell upon the sulliness. Greatly startled, she leaned against a rock and listened intently, but heard only the slow gurgling of the water and her own quick heart-beats.

Reassured, she went on swifty through the narrowing and ever-narrowing path that stretched on to the great wall of rock which closed the cave, and against which the ladder leaned that led to light and to

She reached it pantingly, telling berseif in hurried thought, that in another mo-ment she would stand beneath the sky, freed from these dark straightened walls pressing now painfully upon heart and brain.

Eagerly she stretched out her hand to clasp the ladder rung, and touched only the bare rock! Her heart stood still from the shock, yet she believed she had but missed the exact spot; so she litted the light higher, and saw the whole surface of the bare rock—the ladder was gone!

The recoil from hope to despair, the piteous horror of the truth struck her like a blow; her senses recied, and she fell at the foot of the huge inpregnable barrier, which, like the cruel door of a dungeon, shut out light and life, leaving her to darkness and death. She was awakened to consiousness by the cold touch of water on her hand; her left arm was outstretched and lay towards the pool-the water had risen and reached it.

For one moment of bewilderment she knew not what had happened or where she was; then the ghastly truth returned upon her with a force that sent the blood to her heart in a rush of unutterable horror.

The step was real which she had heard; and a cruel hand had removed the ladder with murderous purpose to cause her death. Yet no-that was impossible; throughout the whole wide world she hated no one, and no one hated her.

It was accident—pure accident; and she was to die as all her race died, by the power of an unseen hand-for she knew she had to die. Stealing onward, only a hand's-breadth from her, was the cold death which even now with insidious touch was ripping to to her feet. She kept her senses—she could measure the time. She knew what was happening, and what must happen. The unwented high flerce tide, realing inwards, had met the fresh water rushing out, and, driving it back by its greater strength, forced it up through the narrow path; and for the next three hours it would rise and rise, till it took her life.

It would not require that time to drown er. Would it take an hour? Yes, perhaps she might live yet an hour; or, if she could climb to some higher ledge of rock two hours might yet be granted to her in which to pray and bid ferewell to life, to her dear home, and to Harold-dearest of

The thought of him brought a gush of sudden tears and an agonized cry The water was gathering cold about her feet; and in terror she held the light up high, lest some spray should touch and extinguish it.

Even in ner fall, her grasp on the one comfort left her-a little light-bad not re-laxed, and it was still safe in her hand; but now she looked on it with eyes full of fear, for it was fast burning away, and in a few minutes atter darkness would fall upon and around her.

In the short spell of light still granted to her she would strive-she would fight bard for her life.

She held the light aloft, and caught at a narrow ledge of rock with her left hand; by this she hung, and she succeeded in placing the lantern on it safely.

To a man, with a man's strength and might, the task would be difficult: to it was an effort that left her breathless and exhausted, as, clinging now with both hands to the rocky ledge, she waited for renewed breath before making one superhuman struggle for her life.

With her strong young arms she succeeded, her terrors aiding her, in drawing herself above the water, and gaining a precarious footing on a little ridge which helped her to reach the ledge where she found

It was narrow, but stanted inwards, and by clinging to the rock above she could stand with tolerable security.

The sense of present safety brought in-The roar followed her like a pursuing | finite relief to the agonized tension of her mind; and, after a minute spent in quiet thankfulness to rest and regain breath and strength, she was able calmiy to scan her situation, and measure the chances of escape with a touch of hopefulness.

She was now so high above the encroaching water that she knew herself to be safe for a time; the great question was, for how long a time? Would it be long enough for her rescue by Carrie, who would assuredly cause a search to be made for her when she and the household grew alarmed at her absence? Yes, yes, it would be long enough if they came soon; but who among them would think of this cavern—would dream of searching for her here? All who could tell of her having entered it were far away—Daniel in his fishing-lugger at sea, Martin miles inland, Pleasance in her home. If they sent to her to inquire,

No, no, that was a hopeless thought—the water would reach her long before any messenger could return from Pleasance.

The thread of her thoughts broke here. and grew tangled and confused; she fancied she heard the sound of many voices, and her heart leaped with joy-it was Daniel and the crew of the Curiew coming through the tide to rescue her.

She awoke from this dream with a start of pained fear.

Was she losing her senses that she should allow so mad a lancy to possess her mind for a moment? Daniel and the Curlew's men could not enter the cave till the fierce tide was at half-ebb; and then, if they found her, it would be lying dead in the dar kness. She drew herself together with a shudder, and turned to look at the dwindling light; then she saw that with an effort she might reach a wider portion of the ledge, where there would be safer footing.

On gaining this; she found a niche in the rock wide enough for to rest in either sitting or standing.

She sat down, and in the confort of this shelter leaned her face upon her arms and wept and prayed silently. When she raised her eyes again the light was gone.

It was a shock; and the darkness at first was overpowering, so crushing all courage and nerve, that she cowered against the rock, clutching it with trembling hands, and even pressing her face to it, because in this ghastly darkness, with death beneath, it seemed a necessity to hold by something.

Some minutes passed thus, she knew not how many—she could not count time now —and then she was startled into a shrick by the sudden tall of the lantern.

It fell, not to the ground, but into the water; and the cry stayed suspended on Estrild's lips as she saw the flood was deep enough to float it; only a few minutes ago, had it fallen, it would have touched ground, now the water bore it up and carried it away; so the floot had risen fast, and it would soon reach her ark of refuge.

In this near approach of death she sought in her memory for words of comfort—words of promise. Many came to her mind, and she said them over many times; yet they grew mingled with the terrible threaten-ings of prophecy—the words of the seers who foretold desolation:

"How wilt thou do in the swelling of Jordan" "When He uttereth His voice there is a multitude of waters," "Give glory before He cause darkness, and before your feet stumble upon the dark mountains, and while ye look for light, He turns it into the shadow of death." "Behold, the noise of the brutt is come, and a great commotion to make desolate, and a den of dragons,"

These broken utterances, and many, many more, came to her in ever-shifting memories; and through all these she was ever hearing the approach of the sea-a confused noise like the murmur of many voices crying "Death-death!"

It was the breaking of the heavy seas upon the mass of fresh water pouring down to meet them; it was the rush and roar of waves dashing sullenly against the great rocks that hernmed them in; it was the sure and relentless advance of the sea that was bringing death upon its waters.

The rising tide had resched the inner portion of the cave, and the nois tury could be heard here at its very heat. Estrild strove to shut out the appalling sound from her senses by hands pressed

But this was vain; it grew in strength, it overcame all thought except the dread sense of its own awiul power.

Those who have stood in battle amid "confused noise and garments rolled in blood" know the very agony of sound, as do those who go down to the depths with the roar of the sea in their dying ears. Before the march of this great sound Etrild's senses fainted; delusive thoughts, strange fancies began to mem within her mind and show themselves around her in visions; of this the compression of the air, driven forward by the water, affecting breath and brain, doubtless was in truth the

Be that as it may, dreams now pressed around her; the sound of the chating surging seas changed to music-a music of preparation for a battle, the tread of innumerable hosts, the marching onwards of countess battalions, mingled with the call of a housand trumpets, the roll of a thousand drums.

Stirred by the mighty sound, she rose in delirium to her feet and raised her voice in a wild song. it was the Crusaders' chant! In a moment he recognized it with a return of sense, stilled her voice, and tell upon her knees clinging to the rock. It was too late -the echoes of the cave had eaught it up and flung it back from rock to rock, from wave to wave, till every rushing wind and every rolling sea sang the Cru-saders' chant in wild repetition, with voices that rose and swelled, died down and rose again.

It was a chant of terror, a chant of doom, and all the superstitions lears of her race swept over Estrild's heart, mingled with a swept over Estring a heart, singles with a sad satisfaction that at her death also this wild funeral-song was not wanting.

And now the preparation for a battle changed to the march past of the crusading hosts; the tramp of ten thousand men swept by; and of all this mighty throng one alone was to live-live to pine in a dungeon and was to live—live to pine in a dungeon and thrust a withered hand through cruel bars for his daily pittance of bread.

As the piteous story ran like a dark thread through her dream, she saw the hand in a pale prison light, beckoning and pointing downwards to the rising flood.

"You too mustdie," whispered an inward voice, not her own. "You, the last of the race on which my hand has taken vance.

race on which my hand has taken venge-ance, must die, and my spirit will find rest. Farewell—an everlasting farewell!" The vision vanished; but, amid a hurry-ing to and fro, and the tremblings of defeat and flight, a thousand signing voices took up the words-"Farewell-an everlasting fare

And then came hand-claspings and whispers of heart-broken partings, cries of pain, hurrying feet trampling down the dying, and again, reverberating through all, the sigh of the sea— 'Farewell—an everlasting farewell!"

The hand with the pale glory on it clutched her hand; and with the cold touch Estrild awoke from the confused vision that darkness and fear and the horror of great sound had brought upon her brain. Her right arm was hanging over the ledge on which she lay; and the water had risen now so high that as it lapped against the rock it touched her fingers. She stretened her arm down in the dark-ness, and her hand was plunged in water to the wrist. So dreaded, death was come; with cold sure feet he had crept on wards till but two inches of rock stood between her and his chill clutch. The sense that all was lost gave her s strange calm.

She drew a little ivory tablet from her purse and strove to write a word of ever-iasting love—a farewell with hope—that migut comfort Harold.

At this instant, when the flood with death's very touch was cold about her feet, a sudden revulsion of feeling seized her.

In the very heart of the death that waited for her, there quivered a small pale light, no larger than the gold star in the heart of the tiniest flower.

But it was the light of a mighty sun miliions of miles away, that, shining as a small ster in the earth's sky, sent now the reflec-tion of his light through a little rift in her dungeon to quiver upon the dark waters and recall her to life and love.

The rift in the roof above her was narrow as the edge of her hand, and in a moment the star had passed; but its message re-mained on the heaving darkness; and, kneeling down, her face upon her cold wet hands, Estrild prayed, and thanked God for the hope that had been sent to her from beyond the worlds, in the message from the shining star, whispering to her spirit that she would be saved.

CHAPTER LIII.

VERY mile that diminished the distauce between him and Estrild lifted a portion of the load weighing on Haroid's mind; and he felt more and more assured that he was right in setting aside all other purposes for the one he was now ful-

To reach Langarth, to stand by Estrild's side and protect her from the un-known fear that assailed her, was his first eat as his debt of gratitude might be to Mr. Irrian, the search for him must be left to Doctor Arnold.

But, mindful of the promise he had made he prosecuted earnest inquiries all along the route—at quaint hosteliles in sleepy towns where the coach stopped for refreshment, and lonely posting-houses where it stayed to change horses.

But at none of these did he gain any information that brought certainty with Descriptions were not wanting of all sorts of travelers-horsemen and footnen, and men in every kind of vehicle that ran upon wheels; but, as Harold listened, he could find no trait of likeness between them and Mr. Irrian; so at length he grew convinced that the unfortunate wanderer had taken the road to Southampton, and gradually his questions dropped, and he heard no more descriptions of strange travelers from stray fellow-passengers, ostlers, innkeepers, and turnpike-men.

In Cornwall at last, on the rugged side it, where the Atlantic rushes down on the thundering shores of Boss and

Harold had promised to take this northern road, not reflecting that it would in-volve a second journey across the country from its rugged iron coat on the north-west to the softer sea on the south shore. A stage from Padstow traversed this route twice a week, and Harold was fortunate enough to each it as it started.

But it was poorly horsed, and so crawled up the great hills or dragged down them with a slowness that chated his spirit ter-

This grew to a feverish impatience when the coach crept along a high heath by the south coast, and he could look down on a surf-tormented shore and watch the long line of phosphoric light that gleamed along the sands or dashed up in pale fire against the tall cliffs that defined the bay of Langarth.

It was a rough night; rain fell in torrents, and a south-west wind, blowing in its strength, flung upon the shore heavy seas, whose thundering falls, echoing far inland, reached the ears of the drenched travelers as, to ease the starveling horse, they toiled up a long hill on foot, with rain and wind beating against their faces.

Full of thought, Harold walked alone to avoid speech with others, for he was not in a mood to "make talk" with strangers. But sometimes a stray word caught his ear, distracting his attention for a mo-ment ere he plunged back into reverie again.

This happened at a spot where two lanes intersected the high road; at this piace the stage had halted, and a rough box was jerked down from the piled roof.

"Here's your box. Mr. Trevail, but where's your horse-and-cart?"

The farmer thus addressed stared about him in dismay; then, putting two fingers to his lips, he whistled loudly.

This brought running towards him a lank boy, who had taken shelter under a tree somewhere down the lane.

"Missus has been forced to send the donkey-cart; the hoss was wanted, sir," said the boy significantly.

"What's up, then?"
The boy answered in a low voice; but Harold heard the word Curiew, and turned now a sharp attention to the colloquy. The farmer however kept silent for some momenta alter receiving the news given to him; but he was evidently excited in a grave way.

"Go home with the cart as fast an you can, and bring on the mare to me. I shall ride over to Langarth, and see what's go-

"I cam't bring the mare, sir; she've been pixy-ridden." "Go 'long, you young varmint, and fetch er to waunce," said the irate farmer.

"Don't tell me none of your strams 'bout "But she's gone, sir," persisted the boy;

"and missus says____,"
"Please take your places, gentlemen," said the driver hurriedly. "I want to get

Every one hastily clambered to his seat as the man waved his whip with impa-tience, and gathered up the reins with a jerky hand. Harold perforce mounted with the rest, and, as the coach slowly descended the hill, the figures of the puzzled farmer and his boy disappeared, but their words re-mained with him.

His seat was just behind the driver's; he leaned forward and said in a very low

"What is going on? Do you know?"
"How should I know?" returned the man with an uneasy laugh. "My ventures don't run in that line."

"The French have landed," said another man, giving Harold a friendly lunge of warning.'

"Going to land, you mean," returned the driver, "eithey bain't caught hand hanged. There's a watchman abroad."

He pointed with his whip seawards; but in the descent of the hill, the bay, the surf-lined shore, and the schooner lying off the headland were all lost to view.

Harold however had caught the verlet meaning of the answers given to bim, and e feit vaguely uneasy. He knew the "landing of the French" was a cant term for the landing of French brandy and other contraband French pro-ducts, and he had a misgiving of danger to Langarth through the daring deeds of the sinugglers.

His mind grew full of forebodings as the memory of his first visit to Langarth shadowed it, whee, as now, a desperate smug-gling expedition was astir, and through it the flie of a Carbonellis was lost,

"How near to the house of Langarth can you set me down?" he asked of the coacu-

"About a matter of two unles," said the man carelessly, flinging the words back as he leaned forward to hear the whispered speech of his friend on the box-reat.

"They are dead to anything but smoog-gling," thought Harold indignantly. "Trey i Freach brandy; they are like hu ers after a fox - mad to pursue then sport."

Being angry, be was injudicious.

"Well, I believe I ought to give information to the coastguard that a certain farmer has lent his horse and cart for a bad pur-pose," he said, in a hard tone; "so you had better try to put me down a little nearer to Langarth than two miles!"

Conversation all around him ceased; every one listened for the coacaman's

"If you don't mind a rough road," said the man, in a civil tone, "you had best get down here; it's nearer by baif a mile that place where I reckoned on stopping."
And which way must I go?"

"You see this lane to the left?" - cointing with his whip, "Keep straight on, and you can't miss. Your portmanty? Yes-Pil leave he at the turnpike. Good night!"

Harold was down in the road now, and the driver was just starting the horses, when, from the window of the cuech, a woman's hand dropped skip of paper, and, by a gesture, signified to Haroid that it was for him. At the same instant the cach drove off, amily the saund of fronical laughter.

"Informers are poor company for honest | from taken dark y.

men!" shouted the coachman's friend. "If we meet again, maybe I'll give ee' a Cornish hug. But there, I never knowed a Londoner who could wrastle!"

"Good riddance of bad rubbish!" cried another voice. "Yah!" yell "Yah!" yelled the coachman, that his voice might reach its mark. "I wouldn't have carr'd 'ee another mile for a hunder' pounds! Informers would make the ould coach smell of sulphur for a mouth!"

Another laugh, and the wheels rolled away through the mud, while Harold was left standing in the blinding rain, his veins tingling with fierce exasperation, mingled with a ludicrous sense of helplessness to avenge himself.

After a second or two of inward raging, he picked up the slip of paper from the road; but it was mud-stained and rain-blotted, and even in a good light would have been hard to decipher; here beneath clouded moon and stars it was impossible. He must find a cottage and get a light, and there make inquiries as to the road. Of course he would not take the one indicated, as it was most likely the wrong

It cost him a good half-hour's walking before the light from a cottage window twinkled out at a little distance. He crosses Hecrossed the field leading to it, and found that a tiny child of five and a poor old bed-ridden woman, stone-deaf, were the only souls at

He gave up the woman as hopeless; the child could only tell him it was a "long way to Langarth."

So he turned to the pencilled lines on the rain-blotted paper, and read this—

"You are a good five miles from Langarth. Do not follow the road pointed out to you. It leads to an old mine; and you might easily fall into a shaft. Go straight on to the four-mile stone; then take the first lane on the left, bearing towards the 804.

On the outside of the folded slip was written

From a friend, who advises a stranger not to meddle, but to leave the coastguard to do its own work."

Harold smile i as he crushe i the paper in his hand.

"I understand her meaning," he said to himself. "She was willing to save me from the shafts of her televed country, but not to help me to inform against her friends. It is a sort of condition she makes. Now I wonder if her route will tumble me over the cliff, instead of into a shaft? Is there no hore to be hired anywhere about here, little girl?"

"Farmer Tievail's hoss to dead, mother said. Her's long with Mrs. Trevail; her's took bad—skeared like into fits. And—and I seed farmer Pryse's hoss not long agone," continued the child, staring at Haroid with round eyes of fright. "And I felt scairt; and I comed in with granne,"

"Where can I find your tather?" asked

Harold impatiently.
"He's gone 'long with the hoss and cart to help the Langarth men. Don't 'ee tell the sodgers, now—will 'ee?"

At this reply Harold felt the chance of his gaining information was hope ess, and he must trust now to his own head and his own fee . He put half a crown in the deaf old wo man's hand and departed.

Her eyes gleame 1 with joy over the colo and she screamed her thanks in a shrill rable, yet was evidently suspicious, for, as Harold stood for a moment pondering out-

Harold stood for a moment pendering outside the door, he heard for in the same shrift tone cry out to the child—
"He bain't ro good, I reckon! You haven't told 'un mauthin', Molly?"
"No, grannie, 'cept that farmer Trevail's wire was skeared most to death."
"Trere, there," shrieked the old womin in her bigh key, 'otton', 'eee tall one in her high key—"don't 'ee tell ne no strams 'bout ghosts! I've seed ghosts enough in my time. I mind the day when the ould Squire was found dead—drowned in your inches of waetur, fasce of 'un lying in the brook; and I seed the Bluck Ede in the brook; and I seed the Black Rider g, by with my aun eyes. Auh, I mand it netter'n I mind what hap'd yesterday! I wes a purty little choeled then. And 'tatles was dear then; they wesn't growed out in fields, like they be now. Auh, 'twas poor times! Barley-bread, and work hard for't. Ghosts? Aun, ghosts will come for us

Harold shut the door on the old woman's recollections; but some of her words rested in his mind, or rather quivered through it, bringing half-awakened thoughts and appensions that he flong aside.

But his heart had a quicker heat as he his face scadfasily towards Lang

The south-west wind had brought in tog from the sea, and he walked through a thick white mist which shut out every land mark, enclosing film step by step in the solitude of soft walls, through which he went as through the cells of a prison, ever alone, nothing visible save the drear whiteness through which he paced darkly.

Fearing to lose the turning to the left which he had been directed to follow, he walked close to the hedge on this side, and felt intensely relieved when he came upon the lane, and heard dimly in the distance the full soft rushing sound of the sea.

Meeting the wind now in its force, he realized its strength, and knew that waveheaped storm high must be sweeping down upon the shore and flinging their spray for up the cliffs on Langarth. He harried feverishly, beating against the fog and wir with strained eyes and rain-battered for every step closed up behind him by the insidious wall of most, and every step in

The lane seemed interminable; and sometimes his doubting heart stayed his steps for a moment in uncertainty; then he pressed onwards, flushed with a renewed lever of haste. Rewarded at last! Out of the darkness of night and mist there loomed upon him suddenly a denser darkness, taking share as he neared it, and resolving itself into a low wall, which surrounded an outlying portion of Langarth. He recognized this lact with a feeling of intense relief; and, going back a step, he took a short run and cleared the wall at a bound.

He was within the pale of Langarth, w thin a short measurable distance of home, by, and love; and yet at this very instant, when his over-weighted heart had sprung back to its balance, and a smile at his own forebodings was standings on his lips, he struck pale by a sound. It was a strangely soft clear whistle, not shrill or ear-piercing, and yet intense and far-reaching as a trumpet, sounding in the guests to Death's feast—a battle.

Struck motionless as though a hand clutched him, Harold stood intently listen ing for an answering signal to this wild call; and, after a time, slow and breathless seconds to a drowning man, it came soft-on the wind, rising from the sea, clear as luminous thread in darkness, and yet mingled with all the weird muffled sounds which crept spectrally through the mist.

It was a souggler's signal," said Har-old to himself, with a breath of reiter, "My nerves are unstrung or chafed, or I should not for an instant have harbored the wild idea that my mysterious fellow-traveler of three years ago—be he man or demon—was whistling in the air to-night."

So saying, darold walked swiftly on-wards, and gradually gained a knowledge of his bearings.

He perceived he was in that wild unfrequented portion of the park which skirled the high rugged cliffs, beneath which the caves ran which he so well remembered visiting.

With the recollection came also the remembrance of the deep ravine or gorge running up inland like a roofless continua-tion of the cavern, and towards which be now leared his steps were bending.

The fear vexed him; for, if this impassable chasm lay between him and Langarth. then he must turn aside and head it; this would increase his walk by more than

That he was nearing it he now felt convinced, for the dreadful roaring of the sea beneath his feet shook the earth, and filled his ears with a sense of interminable sound.

With a horrible power and strength it rolled along beneath him, like an internal frum-beat calling lost souls to the caves of

Louder and louder grew the sullen roar of the pent-up waves, twining, tangling, and foaming in the rocky hollows beneath his path; yet he kept steadily on, resolved that only the chasm itself intercepting the way should force him to turn aside and choose the longer route.

That he was not far from the horrible place he felt convinced, for a thousand wild choes were rushing up its hollows and screaming in his cars. It was a wild night indeed; and the Leaving sea, the strong wind, the sullen roar of breakers on the surf-tossed shore, the aw(n) rush of waters heaped on waters within the cave, the swaving of the creaking trees, all filled the thick darkness with sound shrickng upon sound. Treading carefully, lest the great rift should foom upon him too suddenty, Harold walked on through the whirling sounds when one struck upon his sense that rooted his feet to the ground.

It was the echo of Estrild's delirious song; it was the Crusaders' chant passing wildly down the gorge on the wings of the wild wind.

As a failing star is for an instant ere it is lost for ever, so was the fateful music for one second distinct and clear ere it was lost and the voices of sea and storm.
Yet still the echo from the cave's din seemed to bring it to him in fitful cadence, mingled with the roar of the prison waves. But, when a man is lost at night, with fog and darkness all around him, and anxiety gnawing at his heart, fancies are apt to grow upon the mind, and phantonis, either of sound or sight, are too easily created. Telling himself the truism, Harold facest about, meaning to leave the great visibly darkly to his eyes now, like a clack line in the rank grass, and pursoe his path by the safe road. He had not reached it, when there beened on his vision a dark outline, taking shape as it neared nm.

It came to suddenly that he stepped aside to let it pass, although it was still so far away that by this one step he put it out of eight, and again it was only a darkness coming on softly, yet swittly. A so-torward, and once more it was a shape up thrust through the most, phantom-like, yet

It was the figure of a rider—a man with the set rigid and livid eves of a man in battle, whose horse stands fetlock-nighting

Harold marked the wild trance like aspect of the man with a moment's der; the next instant he had recognised falias.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Since tewby, Charles, how can you call Miss James plain? I wish I was half as good-looking as she is," Her "You are, Hattle, and you know it." (At last advices Hattle was enleavoring to depute where she engel to be pleased or effended at the complitation.)

BY F. E. WEATHERLY.

I buried the old year sighing, I laid it away with tears, With the pitiful faded blossoms Of the unforgotten years: And I turned to my lonely fireside, For I thought what the New would be, With only the ghosts of gladness
To walk through the world with me.

I woke when the belis were ringing. Brightly the morning smiled And there, in the sunny door way There stood a gold-haired child.
And she sang, as afar she pointed, And her eyes to heaven were cast. "He ever the roads so wear

COLLIE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUY'S CHORISTER."

"HIS GOOD ANGEL," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER VI.

OU cannot injure him," she gasped. "It is a mere threat to frighten me."
"I never waste my breath in uncless "I never waste my breath in useless threats," he said grimity. "Look," he added, drawing out a pecket-book, "look! This small piece of paper represents to me unlimited power over the young man, to him several years' pend servitude."

The girl staggered and almost fell.
"What is it?" she whispered.
"It is a forgery! Your brother, in too great haste to be rich, or perhaps in mere absence of mind, signed his master's instead of his own name, one day, the former signed.

of his own name, one day, the former sig-nature being rather more valuable than the latter. By great good fortune this docu-ment happened to fall into my hands, and I have found it incalculably useful in giving me a servant who finds it impossible to refuse to doing my bidding. At the smallest symptom of insubordination, I have w a corner of this magic pocketbook, and hey, presto - the work is

She clasped her hands in agony.
"Oh, my brother!" she cried. "My poor dear boy! Are you too in the tolls? Can I not save you even at my-my own ex-

I not save you even at my—my own ex-pense?"

"I have told you how you may," her husband replied. "While you keep a smil-ing face, this pocket-book holds its secret; but, if you rebel, you seal your brother's doom. You see, you hold his fate in your keeping. What is the result?"

"Heaven help me! Heaven help us both!" the wreached girl cried, throwing herself down in a passion of tears. "What can I do but stay, and sink into the depths can I do but stay, and sink into the depths you have prepared for me."

The snow was falling fast, and Collie sat alone gazing at it with eyes that had a world of sadness in them.

"A year to-day," she sighed, turning round the wedding-ring on a finger that had grown far too small for it—"a year to-day since I married! Ab, it seems like an etern ity! I can scarcely believe now that old life appeared hard to me. It was happiness compared to this; and, when I look forward, and see no end-"

She shuddered and drew more closely round her the white shawl she wore, "How cold it is!" she immured. "The first snow of the year always seems to mean the death of all that is height and fair, and it chills me to the heart. Who's there?" she with a start, as a knock was heard at the door.

It opened, and Lord Stourton slowly en-

Her pale face flushed crimson.

"You, I ard Stourton?" she said, in a tone of surprise. "Don't you know my husband is away from home?"

His usually bright face was pale and clouded, and his eyes did not meet hers. She noticed his strange expression, and continued hurriedly—"Is there snything wrong? "I knew of your husband's absence," he answered, speaking very gravely and sad-ly, cand, though I could not have a harder task than to bring bad news to you, yet —yet there was no one nearer to do it, and I could not let you hear it from-from a

"Bad news!" she gasped. "Hear, hear what? For Heaven's sake, Lord Stourton, don't keep me in suspense! Is—is it Geoff-

He shook his head. "I have heard nothing of or from Tre-berne since he left," he said quickly. "No;

He stopped, and something in his face told her the truth. She threw herself upon her knees before him with an exceedingly

"My brother!" she mosned. pity on me; don't tell me my brother is dead?"

"It would be but false kindness to deceive you," the young man said huskily. "Oh, Lady Treherne, it breaks my heart to be the messenger of evil; but-but you have guessed the truth."

Then let me die too," she cried passionately, "for I have nothing to live ! nothing! Sid, Sid, how could you leave me alone!

agony.

He raised her gently and led her to a seat. He took her hand in his and looked pityingly down at her.

"Lady Treherne," he said, his voice fal-tering, "you must not speak like that.
Dear though your brother was to you, dear as his memory always will be, you must not forget that you have one who is still nearer to you than he; you must remem-ber that, of all ties, a husband is the

She paid no heed to his words. "Why did they not send for me?" she asked. "Why did they not send for me?" she asked. "Why did they not tell me my boy was ill? How cruel it was to keep it from me—from me, who would have crept to his bed-side on my knees had I known!"

Then another thought possessed her, and she rose hastily, clinging to her friend's hand.

"Let me go to him now," she pleaded. "Let me look upon his dear face before they hide it from me for ever. On, Sid! My brother! I promised our mother I would fill her place to you, and yet you have died alone, away from the only one who loved you. Why was I not sent for? Then at least my boy would have died with his head on my breast, and not alone -alone.

The young man's face flushed.

"It—it was so sudden," he murmured.

Something in his voice arrested her attention. She clutched his arm in a nervous grasp, and looked wildly at

"He died suddenly?" she repeated, in horror-stricken whisper. "Did he kill him-

There was no answer in words; but her friend's eyes fell before hers, and she saw in his face the truth he could not speak. The color ebbed out of her already pale heeks, leaving her as if struck herself by he hand of death the hand of death.

After a long interval she spoke, and her voice was strained and harsh.

"Tell me about it," she urged. "Do not fear to let me hear it all. I have borne so much—so much! I think my heart is dead, though Heaven will not let me die. That is my punishment, to live on and on, and to live without love."

The young man drew a paper from his pocket.

"I have a letter for you," he said, "from Sid. They sent for me when—when it happened, for they knew that we were chums! I used to fear he must be short of money, and I wish, how I wish that he had trusted I have far more than I know what to with, and he——" Her eyes filled with tears as she took the

As she saw the boylsh blotted writing; she neld it to her lips, and kissed it passionately, and her face was all tenderness and love as she tore it open. But, as she read, her expression changed to one of horror and abhorrence.

"My darling Stater," it began-"When you read this I shall have left you alone to fight your own tattle. But you will be stronger without me, for I have learned from Treherne that my crime is not only used as a weapon against me, but also against you. I can bear it no longer. My choice has to be made between death and such dishonor as even I, cowardly as I have been, cannot endure; and so, though it is hard to die so young, I cannot hesitate. It will free you too, my sister, free you from the bondage of a field. Forgive me, Collie, forgive my sins and my weakness! I did not mean to be wicked; but he tempted me. You can leave him now, and with my dying breath I ask you to go. He has reined my life-ne has killed me, body and soul. Don't let him do the same with you. Goodbye, dear.'

Lord Stourton watched her anxiously as she read the letter once and then again, and noticed how her face darkened.

Then she crushed the letter in her fin-ers and thrust it into the bosom of her

"Do you know why he killed himself?" she asked, in a voice that seemed horrible echo of her own. "Or, rather, do norrible echo of her own. "Or, rather, do you know who killed him?"

"I guessed," the young man answered gently. "I knew Sid could not be very gently. "I knew Sid could not be very well off, and I feared be was going about rather too fast. I gave him a friendly warm ing once or twice, Lady Treherne, and he must have known that he had only to say one word to me if he wanted money. I would have offered it; but it's the sort of thing one feilow is awfully afraid to do to another. But, if I could have guessed that things were so bad with him, nothing should have stood in the way. Poor Sid! His difficulties would have vanished as if by magic if he would but have confided in me; and now-

"Now, he is murdered!" she interrupted.

The young man started violently "Murdered!" he repeated. "Murdered! No., no, Lady Treherne. Terrible as it is for you to believe it, it was his own hand that was raised against his life."

"I tell you," the girl said solemnly, "my poor young brother was murdered as surely as if the assassin had shot him through the heart. And the murderer is—my husband!

"Good heavens!" exclaimed Lord Stourton. "The terrible shock has been too much for you. You don't know what you say. Treberne! Sid murdered! I tell you I have just come from seeing him lying there, with the pistol in his hand."

She gave a convulsive shudder. Lord Stourton's heart bled for the girl's "You may well think me mad," she said:
"You may well think me mad," she said:
"It is enough to turn the brain of any woman. If you knew more, you would wonder that I could think or speak at all; you would wonder that I live on. I repeat," she continued vehomently, "that the man you call my husband, the man who has been a slave-driver to me, and who first led my boy into danger, has been the one to kill him. How was he to live, my poor brother, with the sword hanging for ever over his head, with no honor, no self-respect? Better a thousand times that he should die as he did than be dragged deeper into the pit! Yes, Lord Stourton, between us, between Geoffrey Treherne and me, lies the respon-sibility of having killed that innocent boy. My brother's death lies at my door; and yet, oh, Sid, it was more for your sake than my own that I gave myself into that man's power!"

"In any case, Lady Treberne," Lord Stourton said very gently, "you must not blame yourself. On whomsoever the onus of this terrible thing may lie, you are innocent. If you have done wrong, you have done it unwittingly, I know. I do not ask you to give me your confidence; but I do beg you to let me be your friend, to let me help you, serve you in any way, for all time, my service alone being my reward."

Her eyes filled with tears.

"Thank you," she returned simply, and laid her hand in his. "I thank you with all my heart. But I have too often relied on others; now I must help myself. We shall be friends, I hope, always, but friends apart. One favor I ask of you, and that is to take me to see n.y lost darling. Then we shall never meet again.

"Never meet again?" the young man echoed excitedly. "Lady Treberne, you mean to do anything rash, to-to

"I don't mean to do as poor Sid has done," she answered, with a smile more sad than tears, "I am too cowardly to kill myself, or I should have done it long ago. But, you are a gentleman, Lord Stourton, and I know you will not betray me, I am going to-night to leave this life and new one. When I have said good-bye to my boy, I shall say good-bye to my past too forever."

So intent was the young man on combat-ing her resolution to see her dead brother that he scarcely comprehended what her words implied

"I cannot take you," he answered. "I implore you not to ask such a thing of me "If you will not take me, I must go alone," she said. "See, I am calm enough "she said. "See, I am calm enough This is the only friendly service you can ever do for me. Will you not help me now when my need is greatest?"

"It is for your sake alone I hesitate," he replied. Then for my sake accede to my request. Lord Stourton. Guide me to where my brother lies, and then, by all the truth and loyalty I know you to possess, say farewell to me forever, and leave methere."

Lord Stourton made no further de-

"My cab is at the door," he returned sadly, "and I am ready to do what you wish.
Only I pray that I may not be wrong in helping you to this."

She rang for her maid in a mechanical

"Bring me my furs," she said to her. "1 am going out with Lord Stourton. And, Nobie," she added, speaking quite calmly, but with a strange hardness in her voice, "pack my—my small dressing-bag with a w necessaries. I shall want it in about an

The maid retired to bring her mistress's cloak; then, when she was wrapped in it, Collie took Lord Stourton's arm and de-ended the stairs. No tears were in her eyes, no faltering in her voice as she gave her orders; but she ooked as white and as cold as the snow that lay outside. They did not exchange one word as they drove through the lighted streets; but, as the cab stopped at a humble house in a dull neighborhood, Collie shuddered violently Lord Stourton made one more effort to space her.

"It can do no good, dear Lady Treherne," he pleaded -- 'no good to any one. He, poor fellow, would have been the first to beg not to do it

But she put him gently aside. ou are good to me," she said. "You try to fill his place. But I must go. His spirit would hover there waiting for me to say good-bye;" and with this she entered the house, and passed up the stairs. At the door of her brother's room she paused and faced her friend. She took both his hands in hers, and looked straight into his kind eves.

"Farewell now," she said, "farewell for the last time. You have been very good to me, very good; and I pray that Heaven may reward you with the love of some wo-man far more worthy than I. I am going to say good-bye to Sidney now; and after that I must be alone."

"Don't send me away," he pleaded. "Lat me stay and take care of you for just a little longer. The sight may be too much for you, you may be ill-",

"No," she answered. "I know my own strength and my own weakness. I

"At least, let me leave my cab at your disposal," Le said. "It I can do no more for you, let me offer that little service. For the rest. I will do as you wish. "Tuank you," she replied abstractedly.

She turned the handle of the door as she quickly spoke, and entered the darkenei room.

. . . All the winter day the snow had been I falling fast. But late in the evening it

At the great oak door, iron-barred, of a large cheerless-tooking tuilding in a little Scotch village a girl stood, her face pale and weary, her hand laid on the knocker. She hestisted strangely. Then at last she rapped faintly, and, as if overcome with sorrow or fatigue, sank down upon the doorstep and covered her face with her hands.

The door was opened suddenly. A tail, gaunt woman came to the threshold, and stood peering out into the night. The next moment she saw the girl at her feet, and sank upon her knees beside her.

Her quick gray eyes instantly took in the letails of the shabby dress and well-worn

"Are you ill?" she asked, in a voice that seemed strangely gentle for her face. "Do you wish to be taken into the hospital?"

The girl looked up wistfully.

"I have come," she answered, "to see Miss Collingwood."

"To see me! I am Miss Collingwood; but I don't know you!"

The other extended her shaking white

'And I," she said—"I am your niece, Collie-

She hesitated, and her voice ceedingly. "Collie Marchtrembled exceedingly. mont!

CHAPTER VII.

DON'T wish to gramble, my dear mother; but I can't help ealling this a most abominable climate. Here have I been aboling on for a fortnight in the hope of getting a day's hunting, while my borses are eating their heads off in the stable, waiting, 'waiting late and early,' for a thaw. I am not an unreasonable man; but surely I have just cause for complaint when, contrary to all decent precedent, it freezes all day, so that hunting is out of the question, and thaws all night, so that *kating is equally sof Sir Guy Menteith spoke in a tone of half-laughing complaint, as he turned from the window to address his mother. He was not handsome, but he had tender blue eyes like a woman's and a kindly mouth, which yet had all a man's firmness in its lines. The face that looked back so lovingly at him was a reflection of his-older and more feminine -- and Lady Menteith rose and laid her hand on his shoulder with a very gentle touch as she answered him. "Don't blame me, Guy. It is your own fault that you would leave your gay friends and come down here to spend your Christ-mas with a stupid old woman, just because she loves you dearly."

"And not because I love her dearly too, my little mother?" he asked, as to stooped and kissed her cheek. "I shall believe she is as stupid an old woman as she profes to be, if she takes my grumbling in earnest, and dees not understand that, hunting or no hunting, that country is the best to me that brings me near her."

"Sitty boy!" she answered, stroking his hair tenderly. "What a foolish boy you are to think so much of me! Why, Guy, at your age most young men have learned to consider it unmanly to care for their mo-thers, and, as each year passes, heed them less, respect them not at all, and out them aside as old-lashioned and rococo."

"Ah, mother," Sir Guy rejoined gravely, it may be that we youngsters deserve that blame; but it is not all our fauli! You, who, since my father's death, have never gone into society—you, who in this quiet place have led the life of arccluse, cannot imagine how mothers in the whirl of London life disgrace the sacred name of motherhood. What love, what respect is a man to have for the woman who turned him over, when a child, to the tender mercies of a servant, who scarcely ever troubled herself to see him, and who now-now that he is old enough to feel the shame of it—frizzes and dyes the hair that ought to be soft and silvery, and daubs with rouge the cheeks be has never dared to kiss? Can you wonder that when women-when mothers do such things, men dare to think light them, and, in thinking lightly of them, must needs condemn the sex?"

"You make me more thankful than ever," Lady Menteith said, "that I am not Lady Menteith said, "that I am not tlife you speak of. But you sadden me, for you make me fear that the ointment has been laid on your eyes, and that you too find all wemen unworthy.'

"Heaven forbid, mother dear! Have I not grown up, year after year, under the tender care and with the gentle guidance of the purest and best? With such an example before me, I could as soon lose faith in the holiness of Heaven as in the truth and virtue of some women. But they are rare, the truth and mother, very rare, and I have been so spoilt by the reality that I have not troubled to make, or to seek, or to find an ideal yet."
"But you will some day," she said, with a ring of anxiety in her voice. "I want to live to see my boy as happy as he deserves, and to hold a second Guy on my knee. You must marry, dear, where and how you please, for your choice can never be unworthy; and it-her son repeated inquiringly, an a:nused look coming into his face paused. "If, little mother?" paused. "If, little mother?"

Lady Menteith sank down again in her easy-chair, and put her feet cosily on the warm tiles in front of the fire.

"Guy dear," she went on, without heeding his questioning tone, "it is very dull for you here and I. I have a sileht head.

for you here; and I-I have a slight headache, and could, I fancy, take a nap till tea-time. Don't you think you might walk over to Holmwood and return the book Maud lent me?

He crossed the room, and, kneeling down beside her, took her white hand in both his own.

"O most deep and diplomatic of mothers," he returned laughingly, "what peasible connection can there be between matrimony and Maud? And whence this sudden headache? Oh, you wicked woman, your eyes are too bright to lend credence either to that or to your sudden desire for a sleep! You want to lead me on, to drive your poor son into temptation, and think that, in despair for lack of other amusement, he will, faute de mieux, give himself over to love-making. And, with that design, you select the most dangerous, fascinating, charming little witch in the county to carry out your machinations and subdue

"Seriously, my dear boy, she is all you

"And, seriously, dear mother, I am afraid to go and see, for I have no mind to marry her."

"But why?"

"The reason why I cannot tell; but, charming as Laoy Maud undoubtedly is, Lady Maud is not my choice. No, mother dear, I have not yet seen the woman with whom I should like to spend my life, excepting always the one to whom a good deal of it has been dedicated, and who now wishes immolate me on the altar of a co-

"Coquette or not, she loves you!"

Sir Guy rose, a little impatiently.
"You judge too partially, mother," he said; "you think every woman's feelings are to be measured by your own, and deem your son trresistible. Lady Maud has played her airs and grees on me, as on many another, and, perhaps, is a little bit piqued because she has not succeeded in enslaving me as soon as some others; but, as for loving-if she has a heart, mother mine, I am not the man who can touch it, and, should we for a moment fancy we might be happy together, we should rue it all our lives.

"Yet she is so lovable, Guy, and so suitable in ever way. She is beautiful, accomplished, rich, well-born—there is nothing left to desire."

"We are like oil and water, mother, we do not flare up, but we could never mix. No, dear; sorry though I am to knock down your favorite castle, you must understand that it is uninhabitable. Be content with your son as he is, and rest assured that you are quite sufficient for his happiness."

Lady Menteith sighed gently.

Lady Menteith sighed gently.

But when I am gone, my boy?"

I won't have you talk honsense, mother," he answered quickly. "Your life is as good as mine, and, for aught I know, you may take it into your head to endow me with a step-lather some day. Why, you have fifty years, at least, to spend with me yet, and will be like the old woman of a hundred-and-twenty, who talked of the degeneracy of her ninety-year-old daughter in finding floor-scrubbing too hard work ter in finding floor-scrubbing too hard work for her. 'A bit laddie like that!' you will say of me, when I am tottering about on crutches. 'He's aye talking about rheumatics, and will na believe me when I tell him it's growing-pains!' But, there," he added, seeing his mother smile brightly—"the question at present under debate is not, how is my life, but how is this most dark and dismal afternoon to be spent. It may not be such a vitally important matmay not be such a vitally important matter; but, at present, it touches me more nearly."

have made one suggestion, Guy." "Which, according to Parliamentary precedent, has been promptly vetoed. I shall stick to my resolution, mother, and shun that lovely snare."

"Is there no skating—no curling?"
"If you saw them there on the pond you would not ask. The steels cut through an inch of it, and the unfortunate adventurer is left to wallow in slush and wet unlimited.

game is not worth the candle. "Walk over and have some tennis or bill-ards with the Woodward girls,"

He shook his head smilingly

'Ilka lassie there has her laddie," he responded, "and I found myself so horribly ie trop last time that I made a vow I would never return without some one for my

Then stay with me and try some of the new novels that have just come from

"Worse and worse! For a fortnight I trying me till I feel that I must rebel against my fate and cast off the bonds of love and murder that have entiralled me. No: I must go out, even in the snow, which, I see, is falling now, and-

"Then suppose you walk over and have a look at your hospital? You don't know how grad the poor folk there are to have a from the outer world."

"By Jove, mother, it is a brilliant idea! I have neglected the place shamefully this year-have not even paid it one visit! What a tellow I am to make fine resolutions and to keep them thus!"

You have done everything for it, Guy,' his mother answered quickly, vexed to hear her darling son assaued even by himsell---vou gave your time and attention when they were needed, now you let them have all the money that is wanted, and, as for personal attention, it is more a woman's work than a man's, and one of my dearest pleasures has been to look after it for

You spoil me, little mother," he said loving y. "I verily believe you would like, if you could to undertake all the duties and bear all the burdens of life for me. But, say what you will, I cannot but blame myself for my long neglect. A few years ago my hospital was my baby, and a spoilt one. The paternal duties were new and delightful then; I thought nothing a trouble, though I have become so lax now. Why, I used to be quite a pet of Miss Collingwood's! How is the dear old lady wear-

"She has not changed in the least. She wrote me some weeks ago, asking my permission to her taking in her niece as in place of one who was leaving, and, as I knew that you, like me, have perfect confidence in her, I did not trouble you about it, being sure that you be as glad as I to do anything to gratify her. I have not been rail around to go over as usual since she well enough to go over as usual since she came, and you must tell Miss Collingwood that, till this severe weather changes, she must not expect me. And, Guy, if you don't mind, you might take a basket of grapes and flowers with you. They are always so acceptable to the poor folk there."

"All right, mother!" the young man re "All right, mother?" the young man responded, rising. "Symonds can cut them while I get ready for my walk. Don't expect me home much before dinner-time, for, you know, I always like to have a cup of tea and a little firstation with Miss Collingwood. By-the-way, Lady Mentelth, how would she suit you for a daughter-in-law?"

"Excellently!"his mother laughed. "Will you bring her home with you, or shall I send my blessing now? She would keep send my blessing now? She would keep you in order as I never can, not to mention that she would mend your stockings and make your porridge."

"And nurse me very tenderly when sick," added, Sir Guy, a little gravely. "She is a good woman and kind, and, if her nice is like her our patients are to be congratulated."

"You say truly." Lodge of the same confidence is like her our patients are to be congratulated."

"You say truly," Lady Menteith re-sponded heartly; "she is a lady to the core. You must give her my love, and tell her she must spare time to come and see me, as I cannot go to visit her. And ask her to bring her niece, who, she says, is a 'most estimable young person.'"

"On which occasion, anticipating very small beer, I shall fly to the arms of Lady Maud. For I know that a 'most estimable young person' in Miss Collingwood's eyes is tall and gaunt, with rasped elbow and a harsh voice, with a modicum of wiry hair though doubtless with a largeness of hear that more than counterbalances bodily pe-culiarities. Now I am off to verify my description, and, if Miss Coilingwood reluses me, to throw myself at the feet of Miss Coilingwood's niece!"

CHAPTER VIII.

T was not a long walk from Guy's Tow ers to the hospital. The young man had built and endowed it some years be-fore, to the endless gratitude of his poorer neighbors, and he never ceased to take a lively interest in its progress.

Notwithstanding the weather he had so abused, he could not but enjoy his short

His way lay over the grass, and under the great trees of the park, the crisp white snow crackling under his feet and spark ling on the branches overhead.

The two great dogs running beside him and tumbling over each other, and throw ing the snow about in uncouth gambols seemed to enjoy the neel ves as well as did their master.

"Down, Luath! Down, Roy!" he said, as together they mounted the steps of the building. "Stay here, good dogs. Perhaps Miss Collingwood may ask you to come in at tea-time, as she generally does; but you must not follow your master's bad example and enter without invitation or

He was shaking off the snow as hespoke, and, while the dogs dropped down upon their haunches with a disappointed whim per, turned the handle of the door and en-

No one was in the long passage; but, familiar with the place and his surroundings, he did not stop to seek a guide.

With a firm, yet naturally light footstep, made still lighter by the thought of disturbing the sufferers, he passed from one pridor into another on his way to Mis-

Collingwood's room.

But at the threshold of one of the wards he paused, and his very heart seemed to stand still at the sound of a voice.

And as he listened, and all his being thrilled with the tones, the words of Geraint came like an inspiration to him-

"This, by God's grace, is the one voice for me!"

The low sweet song continued, and the young man stood there entranced, and the jed, oblivious of everything. Then it coased and it seemed to him that he had falter from heaven to earth.

He waited for a few moments, while all was silence in the room, and then, with a violent effort, be pulled himself together, and moved a few steps forward.

He saw, by the light of a glorious fire, the long bare room he knew so well, with the of white beds on either side, the faces on them lying in shadow.

Near one of them a girl was sitting, just where the pleasant firelight fell full upon

A plain gown of soft gray stuff shadowed the perfect outline of her figure, and a nurse's cap failed to hide the golden glints of her brown hair.

In her hands she held some coarse knit ting; but she dropped it into her lap as sue heard the advancing footstep.

At the sound, too, she turned her face full on the young man, and, though he reme nberied afterwards a strange look of appre-bension be had noticed in the lovely eyes, the sight of it filled him with an overpow-ering sense of happiness, and completeness entered for the first time into his life, and he said to himself again, with Geraint-

"This, by God's rood, is the one face for me!"

She rose as he entered, and stood before him. She seemed the personification of virgin loveliness and purity.

"I must ask pardon for my intrusion," he began, blushing like a schoolboy, and scarcely knowing what to say in apology for entering his own premises unan-nounced. "But"--here he remembered the flowers and fruit he held, and trusted to them to plead his pardon—"but my mother sent these as a sub-titute for herself, and I—well, I combined the pleasure of bringing them to my friends here with the equal pleasure of seeing my other friend, Miss Collingwood."

"Your mother?" the girl said, looking up inquiringly. "I am Guy Menteith," the young man answered simply; "and you?"

"I am Coilie Marchmont—Miss Collingwood's niece and namesake; and I am your debtor, Sir Guy, for a happy home and an occupation I have already learned to-to

"You-you," he stammered, "Miss Col-lingwood's niece?"

He blushed more vividly than before at the thought of the ludicrous difference tween the fancy picture and the real-real

Then his presence of mind returned to him, and he took her hand.

"It is I who am indebted to you," he said, "for filling an onerous post in such a way as to earn commendation on all sides. Only it makes one long to be ill, and won der at the same time how it is possible to from the door yonder. It orpheus could move stones and trees, surely you——"

A smile broke over her fee.

"It is no part of a nurse's duty to listen to high-flown compliments, even--even from her employer, Sir Guy," she inter-rupted, 'and indeed they are out of place. I love my work, and I love every patient who is included in it; and it is for them that sing, not for secret listeners."

"By Jove, I envy them!" the young man responded, with great earnestness. "But now where and why are you going? This is your ward, I suppose?"

"It is; but I think I may safely leave it in your charge for a few minutes. I will go and find my aunt for you, Sir Guy. She, as lady superintendent of the establishment, is the proper one to receive all gifts of flowers, fruit, or-compliments; and she, as a woman of experience, knows exactly now to distribute to each patient or nurse the share each ought to have."

the share each ought to have."
With a parting smile, she left him. He looked after her as if he could not bear to let her go out of his sight.
Then, when the sounds of her footfall had died away, he turned to the beds and began to speak to their inmates, with a kindly word for all.

kindly word for all.

And somehow with each the conversation turned on the new nurse. Each suf-ferer had something to say in praise of her patience, her sweetness, her tenderness She had never a sharp word or a cross look for one of them, bless her!

She would toll night and day for them, would read, sing, write letters, tell stories. do anything to make them content and

The days did not seem laif so long since she had come; and wasn't she a lovely singer?

Love her? One and all would lay down lile for her sake! In such conversation it was wonderful how the time passed till Miss Collingwood came bustling in.

"The sight of you is gude for sair ean," she exclaimed, as she entered, holding out both her hands. "What an age it is since you have been to see us!"

uy returned her warm grasp very heartily. "You cover me with confusion," he de clared; "and I don't know what to say to excuse myself."

'Then never heed about saving any thing," the old lady replied. 'We are too glad to see you again even to gramble about your absence."

"And how are things getting on, Miss Collingwood?

"Fine, fine, Sir Guy, thanks to you and your lady mother! Though I say it who shouldn't, there isn't a better kept place in the whole country. It would be a shame for us if it werena, with you and her so generous and grudging nothing."

"There, there, Miss Collingwood, we are more than re varied by being able to help poor folk. What is our money given us fir, if not to do some good with? By-the-way," he broke off abruptly, "I am glad to hear you have the company of your niece, Mas----

"Colle, as she has age been called, though her name's plain Collingwood, like inhie. Why, where is the lassie? Well, Sir Guy," sne added confidentially, coming a little n arer; 'as she isna about, I may tell you that I cannot think now how I got on be-tore she came. She is as winsome and as helpful a bairn as ever I saw."

"I can quite believe it. But where has she gone? Is she making me a cup of that fous tea to which you used to treat

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

It was spiteful, but spitefulness cannot be legislated out of housan name. Obdi you hear that Mrs. South is having her poure pointed? "You don't say so! That old thing! "Yes, indeed; painted in oil." "Well I never! In oil? If she ever wants to have a good likeness sne'll have to be painted in vinegar."

Scientific and Useful.

BELTS AND PULLEYS. - Belts conveying power are very apt to slip on pulleys, but a new pulley has been devised to prevent his. The pulley is covered with perforated sheet-iron one-sixteenth of an inch thick, which is riveted to the pulley. The tension on the belt causes it to slightly grip the holes, and thus slipping is avoided, while at the same time the pulley is strengh-

THE TRETH.—Russian observations have shown that teeth decay in a quite regular order, the lower third molar being the first attacked, then the upper, then the lower fourth molar, and so on, the lower incisors and canine teeth being the last affected. Upper teeth, as a rule, are more durable than lower, right than left, those of dark persons than those of blondes, those of short persons than those of tall.

A YEAR CLOCK.—A novelty is a clock which is wound by electricity so that it will run a year, or until the battery concealed in the case will need renewing. Two small cells of the battery on the interior of the clock furnish electric current for a motor connected to the movements, when called up in by the closing of the circuit, every sixty minutes. The motive power of the striy infinites. The motive power to the clock is derived from the action of a fine spring, as in the ordinary clock, electricity acting in the capacity of a key to wind up just as much of the spring as that required to the capacity of the capacity minutes. to run the clock for the past sixty minutes.

PRESERVING WOOD.—A plan recently into duced into Belgium for preserving wood from decay produced by the atmosphere, water, etc., is to fill the pores with liquid gutta-percha, which is said to per-fectly preserve it from moisture and the ac-tion of the sun. The solid gutta-percha is liquefied by mixing it with paralline in proportion, about two-thirds of gutta percha to one-third of paraffine; the m xture is then subjected to the action of heat, and the gutta percha becomes sufficiently liquid be easily introduced into the pores of the wood. The gutta-percha liquefied by this process hardens in the pores of the wood as it becomes cold.

ONE WAY TO RESIST COLD .- It is said that when exposed to severe cold a feeling of warmth is created by repeatedly filling clongs to their utmost in this manner; Throw the shoulders well back and hold the head well up. Inflate the lungs slowly (the head well up. Inflate the lungs slowly (the garments being loose), the air entering entirely through the nose. When the lungs are completely filled, hold the breath for ten seconds or longer, and then expire it quickly through the mouth. It is important for all to practice this exercise many times each day, especially when in the open air. If this habit becomes universal, long diseases and many others will sallung diseases, and many others, will seldom be heard of. A permanent expansion of the chest of one, two, and even three inches, will eventually follow.

Farm and Garden.

FOR VERMIN.—An ordinary rubber atomizer, which costs about $2, is an exceltent article for spraying green-house plants when affected by plant lice.

THE LIQUIDS.—The liquids from the stables are from three to six times as valuable as the solid portions, and it pays to save such. The best mode of so doing is to use some kind of absorbent material.

INCURATORS. - Incubators are now established all over the country, and in expienced hands have been demonstrated far superior to hens for hatching early broilers, as they can be put in operation at any time, thus enabling the operator to get the broilers into market at any period desired.

Composts .- As a rule, composts !should be prepared a length of time before using in proportion to the roughness and coarse ness of the materials. Not less than si ess of the materials. Not less than six reaks will be required under favorable recumstances for the average materials sed in composting to become broken down termentation and decomposition, so permit of uniform mixing and easy dis-

CLOVER .- In summer swine graze and well on clover, and, indeed, are perhaps realthy and make as cheap and satisfactory growth on that food as any other. There is no reason why clover should not enter into the winter rations of swine. Sweet clover hay could be cut up into short lengths and fed wet, along with meal and bran, without much trouble and with the best of results.

POMACE.—There is a big cider-mill in Northwestern Pennsylvania, and the farmers around there cart away the pomace as soon as it is made to feed to their cows. One man began at once feeding a peck of pomace, night and morning to each cow, and noticed an immediate increase in the flow of milk. The cows kept increasing in milk and flesh as the ration of pomace was increased, which finally reached a busilet and a half per day.

PEAS -Those who have made the trial assert that the easiest and chespest wav support peas is with three small galvanized wires stretched on stakes twenty feet apart, and at distances according to the size of the plants. Holes are made in the ground with a crowbar, and stakes two or three inches in diameter firmly driven io. On these the wires are stretched by passing once around in notches, or on suit noils. Such a sup-port is placed in less time than brush, and it will last or may be used for many years

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 10, 1888.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION. (IN ADVANCE.)

1 Copy One Year..... $2 00 2 Copies One Year 4 Copies One Year, and One to getter-up of Club 6 00

10 Copies One Year, and One to getter-up of Additions to Clubs can be made at any time during the year at same rate.

It is not required that all the members of a Club be at the same postoffice.

Remit by Postal Order, Postal Note, Draft, Check, or Registered Letter. Always enclose postage for correspondence requiring separate reply, to insure response. Advertising rates furnished on applica-

Address all letters to

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

Publication Office, 736 Bansom St.

Prophets of Misery.

There are certain people who are ever look. ing on the dark side of things and predicting evil and misery. Who are they? They are men soured by failure, jaundiced with envy, swollen with a tumor of conceit, or poisoned by the vapors of an unsound digestion. They are the men whose illusions of youth are gone, and who, because they have been discouraged, believe that they have been deceived. Accordingly they act out their lives with a melancholy resignation that is contagiously depressing, or mount upon the house-tops and shriek against destiny.

They are the men who picture the world as a shadowy, plague-haunted valley, through which we grope and stumble to an open grave. They open a book only to skip the bright pages and to dwell upon the gloomy, In a garden, radiant with color and breathing the sweetest perfumes, they see nothing but the fallen leaf and the blight, smell only decay and rottenness. They are the wasps of humanity, sucking poison from the flower that yields honey to the bee.

The habit of looking on the dark side blinds them to the light, until, like the noble, who passed his youth and manhood within dungeon walls, and was released only at the age of 86, they beg to be taken out of the sunshine and to be permitted to pass the rest of their days in beloved darkness.

If our despondents were content with their own martyrdom, all might be well. Unhappily, they must have disciples and victims. "I'll larn yer to be a frog!" and Rodger thereupon hoed the unlucky reptile to pieces. With something of the same spirit do our misery mongers behave towards the man who dares to regard this as the best of all possible worlds. "I'll teach you to be happy!" and forthwith is put before him a gruesome panorama of woe and want, failure and feebleness.

Does he live in the country: he is informed, with elaborate unpleasantness, of the evil effects of natural drainage, and the microscope is called in aid to show that in the waters of the mossy spring lurk death and disease. Does he live in the city: he is warned that after three generations his race becomes extinct.

The microbe, or germ, is added to the terrors of life. An innocent delight in preserved meats and fruits is tortured into a taste for potted death. Some physicians appear to have found a new mission in life -to remove every smiling face.

But, it may be urged, these misery mongers act with the best intentions. The road to a certain place is paved with such intentions. To knock a man into a ditch, and then to excuse yourself with the plea that you did it for the best, is to be as considerate and consistent as was the captain who, on landing, boasted that he had left the whole ship's company the happiest tellows in the world. "How so?" asked his triend. "Why, I have just flogged seventeen, and they are happy it is over, and all the rest are happy they have excaped.'

It may be possible to make some men contented by contrasting their condition with that of less fortunate creatures; but you cannot make them happy by this process any more than did the Spartans owe the sobriety of their citizens to the slaves whom they made drunk by way of spectacular warning.

Men may be made happy by contrasts. but not by contrasts that excite pity. "In traveling by night," says a well-known author, "we get glimpses into cheerfullooking rooms, with the light blazing in them, and we conclude involuntarily how happy the inmates must be. Our conclusion may be wrong. There may be heaven in those rooms, or there may be hell, yet are we made happy by the reflection of another's appearance of happiness.'

How are we to deal with our misery mongers? The story is told of a party of French ladies and gentlemen, driving in two coaches from Versailles to Paris, that they were overtaken by a violent storm. On alighting, the occupants of the first coach wished to compare notes with the occupants of the second as to the severity of the tempest. What was their surprise on learning that those who rode in the second coach had no knowledge of the storm.

The truth was that Madame de Stael, by her wit, had fascinated her companions and made them oblivious of their outward circumstances; while in the first coach sat one of those pleasant gentlemen who seized upon the storm as an excuse for raking up all the stories he had ever heard of death by lightning and drowning.

Herein lies the secret of how to deal with our despondents. Avoid their company, and ride only with those who take a cheerful view of life.

If, however, fate has put you into the same coach with one of these creatures, then must you cultivate that form of courage upon which too little value is apt to be placed-the courage to be happy in spite of them.

No one should underrate the inevitable sorrows of life, nor deny to them the sympathy and loving aid which should ever be extended to them; but permanent misery cannot be regarded with very much respect. It certainly speaks of grave defects in character, of faults that need pruning away, of feeble qualities that need stimulating. Life is largely what we make it, and, whatever may be its clouds and storms, they will be chased away at length by the clear sunshine of a strong and noble character. "Fill thy heart with goodness, and thou wilt find that the world is full of good."

It is noticeable how intuitively in age we go back with a strange fondness to all that is fresh in the earliest dawn of youth. It we never cared for little children before, we delight to see them roll in the grass over which we hobble on crutches. The grandsire turns wearily from his middleaged, care worn son, to listen with infant laugh to the prattle of an infant grandchild. It is the old who plant young trees; it is the old who are most saddened by the autumn, and feel most delight in the returning spring.

Most of the alienation and ill feeling that poison domestic and social life come from a spirit of intolerance, fortified by ig. People resent small wrongs and hasty words, and visit upon them bitter reproaches and petty revenges, thus stirring up anger and animosity. If they would only acquire the habit of looking for the causes of the irritation, they would find themselves in a calmer and a gentler mood, and better able to give that "soft answer which turneth away wrath."

HE to whom his family and his home are only cares and duties, whose heart does not spring to them with gladness when toil is over, may be sure that all is not right with him. He is certainly to be pitied, for he loses the purest and noblest joy that can fill the intervals of life, and the best preparation and motive for its labor. Indeed the affections are perhaps the most potent forces in making leisure a blessing.

every cupboard; but the most hideous specimen of the kind is family ill will No country can prosper with civil war gnawing at its heart; and a house divided against itself must sooner or later inevitably come to grief. Tact and worldly wisdom will go far towards the prevention of family jars; but kindliness, mutual forbearance and self-control will go still farther.

THE gitts of knowledge enable a man to enjoy all he sees. Every one can redeem himself from that animal life which is a living death. The object of education is to make the most of life, by which is meant not the attainment of mere worldly success, but an esteem for what is really good, a desire to benefit one's fellow men, and above all to find a real peace with God.

In order to gain self-control we must study curselves, especially as to our weak points of character, and aim to conquer specific modes or habits of evil to which we are prone. The apostle speaks of "the sin which doth so easily beset us;" and every one who is accustomed to study his heart, finds some point at which Satan works with special facility.

KNOWLEDGE does not comprise all which is contained in the large term of education. The feelings are to be disciplined, the passions are to be restrained; true and worthy motives are to be inspired; a profound religious teeling is to be instilled, and pure morality inculcated under all circumstances. All this is comprised in educa-

THY love shall chant itself its own beatiudes, after its own life working. A childkiss, set on thy sighing lips, shall make thee glad; a poor man, served by thee, shall make thee rich; a rich man, helped by thee, shall make thee strong; thou shalt be served thyself by every sense of service which thou renderest.

READ not books alone, but men, and amongst them chiefly thyself; it thou find anything questionable there, use the commentary of a severe triend, rather than the gloss of a sweet lipped flatterer. There is more profit in a distasteful truth than deceitful sweetness.

IT is no small commendation to manage a little well. He is a good wagoner who can turn in a little room. To live well in abundance is the praise of the estate not of the person. I will study more how to give. a good account of my little than how to make it more.

As the rose-tree is composed of the sweetest flowers and the sharpest thorns; as the heavers are sometimes fair and some. times overcast, alternately tempestuous and serene; so is the life of man intermingled with hopes and tears, with joys and sorrows, with pleasures and with pains.

THE avoidance of little evils, little sins. little inconsistencies, little weaknesses, little follies, indiscretions and imprudences, little toibles, little indulgences of self and of the flesh; the avoidance of such little things as these goes far to make up, at least, the negative beauty of a holy life.

A VIRTUOUS and well disposed person is like good metal-the more he is fired, the more he is fined; the more he is opposed, the more he is approved. Wrongs may well try him and touch him, but they cannot imprint on him any false stamp.

As the musician straineth his strings, and yet he breaketh none of them, but maketh thereby a sweeter melody and better concord, so God, through affliction, makes his own better unto the fruition and enjoying of the life to come.

FAITH depends on the state of our hearts. It may be smothered by the lusts of other things in the soul. It may be undermined by an evil conscience. A lite of prayerlessness will lead to the extinction of

Do to day's duty, fight to-day's temptation, and do not weaken and distract your-SEELETONS there must and will be in | self by looking forward to things which you cannot see, and could not understand if you saw them

The World's Happenings.

A canary at Sacramento is 18 years old. This country has just half the railroads Rich Chinamen of San Francisco carry eweled revolvers.

A Knightville, Me., family have moved 77 times in the last 18 years.

A raw egg, it swallowed in time, will ffectually detach a fishbone in the throat.

A Massachusetts preacher has been disalssed by his congregation because he used tobs

Paper money in Peru is now used to ight cigarettes with. The currency collapse is com-

The average salary of the ministers of the Southern Presbyterian Church last year was only $552.

A very red-headed citizen of Atchison, Kansas, says that when a boy he had the scarlet fever and it settled in his hair.

In some sections of Maine the doctors have been compelled to put on snow-shoes in order to make their rounds of visits. "Johnson, Gallup & Hurry" is given as the name of a New York firm, which is said to be a busy and enterprising concern. An enterprising fruit vender in Lancaster, Pa., now roasts peanuts in a cylinder driven by eighth horse power electric motor. A young man in Brooklyn, N. Y., has grandfathers, 2 grandmothers, 2 great-grandfathers and four great-grandmothers living. Senator Farwell, of Illinois, has an income of $700 a day. It has not been many years since he was working in Chicago for $8 a month. A man who was arrested in Omaha for begging wore 5 pairs of trousers, 3 vests, 3 coats, 3 shirts, and had 3 hats, two of them being in his

"Continued "meowing" at night has evidently had its effect upon energetic citizens in Orlando, Fla., as 57 cats have been poisoned there in one week. There is no longer any ground for speak. ing of the mule as "indestructible," one of them near Milledgeville, Ga., having been gored to death

A house in New Jersey which had been keptinsured for 39 years burned up the other day between the lapse of one policy and the taking out of another. "The Letter that Never Came" is the title of a recent song. An appropriate companion piece for it would be "The Letter that Never Went" viz., the letter given by the wife to the husband to

If the door creaks, and you can't get oil, and can get a soft lead pencil, rub the point into all the crevices of the hinges and the creaking will case. Even if you can get oil, the black lead is

The Rev. Mr. Root, of Auburn. Me., a Yale man, is credited with saying: "President lwight, of Yale College, is the only man I ever knew who could sit with his boots in the air and be a

In an Elko, Cal., hotel a man put $5,000 under his pillow for safety and forgot it when he went away in the morning. It remained there safely for three days, notwithstanding two strangers slept in the room meantime.

A story comes from Danbury, Conn., that an aged couple have seen found in that place in a destitute condition, their children, 14 in number, having deserted them, although the father is blind and the mother paralyzed.

It has been ascertained that, free as light and air are, there are over 27,000 families in the city of Paris inhabiting apartments having no other openings than a door, and at least 60,000 families in he city of London reside in cellars.

An immense owl was observed by some sportsmen on a perch in East Galena, Itl., and denite several well directled shots the bird did not fall nor even move in the slightest. On examination it was learned that the bird was dead and frezen to the

At a recent trial for hog stealing in Mt. Pleasant, Texas, the Court declared that the marks by which the animal could be identified had no een clearly described to the jury, and the hog was thereupon brought in and placed in the witness-box on exhibition.

The city authorities of Tuscon, Arizona. have offered a prize of $100 to the boy who will p the largest number of young trees within the limits before the Fourth of July next. The presen ation will be made a feature of the Independence Day celebration.

A tall women entered the Erie depot at Jersey City the other day and, announcing herself to be Queen Victoria, started in to hug and kiss every man she met. Afterwards it was learned that the Queen was on her way from Bellevue Hospital to the Middletown Asylum.

A negro church sexton in Louisville, whose fascination for poker led him to fit up a play-ing room in the church tower, now has more time of his hands than he can profitably dispose of. His is were discovered by the congregation and be was immediately dismissed.

Kansas has more odd newspaper names than any other State. Here are a few of them: The Wano Rustler, Chesterville Paralyzer, Cheroke Cyclone, Climanoa Sod House, Lake City Prairie Dog, South Centre Bazoo, Vailey Falls Lucifer, Garden City Bundle of Sticks.

When a horse falls into a hole in the ice, after he is rescued, says an exchange, the down east ice cutters pour brandy down his throat, ruhim down well and put him in a warm stable. Un old horse fell in four times in one week. Whenever the brandy was poured into him he just seemed to sigh with deep-satisfaction. The stable boss con-cluded the animal got into the water purposely to secure the brandy and put blm at another job.

I WONDER WHETHER?

BY RITA.

I wonder whether, some sweet day When all the clouds have passed away From our dark lives of strifes and sours, To change the sad to gladsome hours, The Fates will make her mine for aye?

And there will shine a golden ray of love so good, so glad, so gay,
Across our path, and only ours—

1 wonder whether?

And cares that now hold tyrant-away
Will pale and pale, and then grow gray,
And lose their old tyrantic pow'rs,
And die forgotten in the flow'rs—
The joy that makes it always May—
I wonder whether?

Winning a Bride.

BY LUCY FARMER.

HARLEY," said I, one morning pretty early, "do you know what the twentyfifth of September is?"

"What it is?" he replied, quite carelesslike. "What of it?"

"What of it, Charley?"—Don't you know it's our wedding-day? The twenty-fifth of September we were married."

"I thought it was the twenty-ninth," says Charley, smiling; "it ought to have been, if it wasn't. Well, Lucy, I won't contradict you, girl; and, as I said, what of it?"

A child could have flounced me then. Our own seventh wedding-day, and he to say, "What of it?" I could ha cried, only I wasn't goin' to let Charley see any such weakness. So I only said—

"If you're such a stupid as not to know vou've been married seven years, Charley Farmer, perhaps you'll take my word for

I was put cut; and no wonder! Any one with the feelings of a woman would have been. Charley is sometimes very provokin', too. This time he said, with a jeerin' kind of tone—what he calls "dry"

"Oh, I know it well, Lucy; I don't deny the impeachment; but I was surprised, greatly surprised, when you said seven years, my dear! If you had said four or five—"

"What, Charley, and the boy just six! Get out with you! Well, do be sensible now for a minute. Listen to me for once." He smiled again, but I took no notice. "Charley," says I, very solemn, "the seventh year is a lucky year. The twenty-fifth is a lucky day, so old Rachael says. Mr. Martyn-Henry's overseer, Mr. Strong, has been here. Well, he has asked us to go and pay a visit to him and his wife—Polly Meek, you remember her; and I vote we go on the twenty-fifth, which is a Saturday, and remain until Monday or Tuesday, if Mrs. Cardewe will let us oft." She'll let us off, right enough," said

Charley. "Shall we bring the young uns?"
"Of course. Fancy me leaving Charley there, or little Dolly either, although Charley is six, as you forgot."

"Well, then, I'll ask Mrs. Cardewe, and send a line to Strong and his missus. That's only polite. We shall enjoy the change for a while; and Wenton Hall is a pretty place, I'm told. Bless me! Lucy, the feet is on Monday the 27th, I declare—the yeomanry feet."

"Fate, you mean, Charley. It's French. Yes, I knew the fate was to be, so I thought you'd like to go and see the soldiers' games."

"Capital, Lucy! I declare we'll have a regular honeymoon again—it will be like old times."

"Not with the two children, bless them! But we've got them, honey or no honey; and they're as good as gold!" I had to kiss them both after that, and so had Charley; though he does it oftenest when he thinks I don't see him; I'm sure it's nothing to be ashamed of!

The day came, the twenty-fifth of September, a lovely, warm autumn day. Oh, it was delicious as we drove through the pine-woods, me and Charley in front, and young Charley and his sister sitting behind in the trap, with the foot-board closed up.

They couldn't see much, poor things, but they were wrapped up and eating sweeties a'most all the way, and didn't care much for scenery.

Wenton Hall is certainly a lovely place. It's in Dorsetshire, and is surrounded with grass-land.

There are drives through the park and some fine trees in it, and people often walk across from the town over the fields; and from the major's gate in the hedge the view of the old town, with its chestnut avenues and old church, the new prison, and the ancient Roman camp, is very lovely of its kind.

We drove across country, and reached Mr. Strong's house in the afternoon. We had a hearty welcome from them, and though Polly rather turned up her nose at the children, having none of her own—which is perhaps a mercy—we were all very comfortable.

This was Saturday, and on the Sunday we went to church morning and afternoon; and in the evening we took a walk round the park and away off towards the high ground, where we could see the blue sea.

"Are the mines yonder?" inquired

Charley.
"Yes," replied Mr. Strong, "they're yonder. We don't do much now."

"Hallo," whispered Charley to me, "here's a fine young lady! Who's she, I wonder? Is she a visitor?"

"No; a friend. She's a Miss Mather, one of our belles, and a great friend of Mrs. Henry's. Every one wants to marry her, but old Rachael here says she will be saved from a great peril and marry her preserver."

"Does old Rachael still tell handfortunes?" I asked.

"She does," replied Polly Strong. "She told mine as true as true!"

"And Major Williamson's too, Polly," remarked her husband. "Do you remember the bazaar where old Rachael told his lines? He was to go through death's door to his love!"

"Yes; Major Williamson is staying here now," said Polly; and then the conversation about old Rachael and her palmistry drooped, though I am free to confess I think she was very clever with it, and never took money.

The Sunday passed quietly. Monday came, light and sunny.

The sports, the yeomanry sports, were to begin at one o'clock. Long before that time people came trooping up across the fields, and plenty of ladies and gentleman rode out on horseback.

Mr. Strong knew all the grandees, and he pointed them out to us.

"Look, Lucy Farmer, there's Mr. Easton and his beautiful daughter. Isn't she haughty-looking? but you should see her riding to hounds! There's Captain Franks-fine man, isn't her and such a lovely place of it, eh? Look, here's the Miss Mathers with Captain Williamson and Mr. Mathers—captain he is, I'm told. There's the governor-he looks a soldier, don't he, Lucy? He's the prison governor up town. There, he's chatterin' with Miss Brightstone-isn't she pretty?-you can hear his laugh over here! There they come on the horses-that's a gentleman from London, the one in knickerbockers, an army soldier, so are his friends. There's the great book-writer, Mr. Softlylives in the red house yonder, see.

I nodded. We were sitting in the trap and could see splendidly.

"Those two young ladies coming near us are the prettiest of all," I said.

"They're the Miss Mathers—isn't the youngest one lovely? Look at her eyes!" "Give me the other, Mr. Strong. There's a fine face for you, and such a figure. Oh, isn't she a beauty! What's her name?"

"I don't rightly know. Daisy I have heard her called in private when I've been in-doors; Margaret, I suppose."

It was certainly a very pretty sight. There were races, or rather hurdie-races, jumping prizes, tent-pegging, tilting at the ring, sword and lance play, and single-stick on horseback.

A large space—it was a portion of the park—was set aside for the tilting and pegging; and altogether it was very enjoyable.

As we were watching the sports, Captain Williamson and Miss Susan Mather came up near us. They were chatting very pleasantly, although she seemed rather shy, and so did her horse.

"Charley," said I, in a whisper, "I wouldn't be on that chestnut for something. Look at his ears."

"Oh, he's quiet enough," replied Charley. "You look at the sports, and never mind the ladies and gentlemen."

But I couldn't help it. The yeomanry men were tilting at the ring, down the hill, which faced towards the sea, which was a long way off; and as each man thundered down the turf, Miss Susan's horse pricked up his ears and got fidgety. You know what that means. Her sister's little mare got fidgety too, and Captain Williamson's big black horse pawed the ground until he had made a regular burrow under him.

Sometimes the yeomen couldn't pull up, and then they dashed down between the lines of carriages like the Bengal Lancer in Miss Thompson's picture who has "missed," and which we have hanging in our little there's a hole we blastered in mistake in the cliff, and every tide tons of water

After one of these bursts there was a cry, and then a shout—then a roar and a trampling of hoofs, and before you could say tom-tit, away dashed Miss Mather's horse.

Charley, with the greatest presence of mind, jumped out of the trap and caught Miss Susan's bridle, or her animal would have been off too.

Oh! it makes me quite sick-like to see the tall, beautiful young lady at racing pace away over the turf, and Captain Williamson hot-feet after her.

Major Martyn-Henry, he roars out, "Stop, all of you! don't hunt her down"—and then he, with the other gentlemen, went off, while the yeomanry men formed up and kept back the crowd.

It was terrible. Mr. Strong turned the trap, and drove to the top of the knoll, which he knew would enable us to see far down the slopes. And, oh! I could scarcely look.

There was the young lady flying away, her hat off, her habit streaming out, the horse racing like mad upon the turf, and Captain Williamson dashing after her like a madman too.

"Mercy on us!" screamed Mrs. Strong, though she never was that by nature— "Mercy on us, she'll fall into the old shaft! She's headin' right for it. Oh, Mr. Farmer, whatever shall we do?"

Many of those around knew her danger, and many a prayer I heard for her. "God help her!" said the men. "Heaven preserve her!" cried the women, all under their breath. We couldn't speak out.

"There, there! look-she sinks, she's

"No, she isn't!" cried Strong. "I can't stand this; get along, mare;" and he lashed the animal down the bill.

Others did the same: yeomanry, ladies, and gentlemen; some hundreds on foot, in carriages, on horseback, in traps of all kinds, started off—all but Mrs. Martyn-Henry and two grooms.

She drove to the house for brandy or wine, or anything that might be wanted; and sent the grooms on horseback for doctors, with orders to put the doctors on the horses, and walk back themselves. "Miss Gladys," as we still called her, between ourselves, was the most sensible woman there, though I had whispered to Charley to go for a doctor, myself. Of course he didn't; he was too anxious to see the end.

We drove a long way, and came near the old shaft. The ground shelved down, the late wet weather had caused a slip too, and a mass of earth and grass, and stones and rubbish, and what some one said was "deborah," or something like that, slid down into the great hole in the side of the hill, and Miss Mather, horse and all, had been swallowed up in the tunnel of the mine!

It was awful, and we cried like babies, some of us. Oh! I was thankful I had left the children at the Strong's house, for I was no better than a baby myself.

I shall never lorget the awful silence for a few minutes, and then Captain Williamson and Major Martyn-Henry called for pickaxes and men.

I hid my face on Charley's shoulder, and cried like a child. Poor Miss Mather!

Amongst all the sobbing, tearful faces, amid all the stern-looking men, one young lady was as calm outwardly as marble, and indeed she looked like it. This was Miss Susan Mather, who was sitting on her, and Charley had offered to hold the spare horse.

"My good fellow," said Captain Mather—a fine, tall, pleasant-spoken gentleman he is—"is there any respectable woman her little horse; her father was standing by —a fine, tall, pleasant-spoken gentleman he is—"is there any respectable woman you know who will attend to my daughter?"

"Yes, sir." says Charley: "my wife, sir.

"Yes, sir," says Charley; "my wife, sir, well known to the major and Mrs. Henry, will see after the young lady, and proud to wait on her."

But others came, ladies in carriages, and begged Miss Susan to dismount and ride with them. But she wouldn't.

Her beautiful clear eyes were fixed on the tunnel-shaft, which they said sloped down, down to the mine, which ran even under the sea! She knew that.

Poor young lady, I did pity her, and made so bold as to speak to her. She only shock her head, but never said a word.

"Mr. Strong," said I, as an idea crossed my mind, "wherever does this mine end?"

"In the Channel," he says, "a long way under the water; and worst of all, which some don't know-but I do, only I daren't ell it—it's flooded at high water, for there's a hole we blastered in mistake in the cliff, and every tide tons of water breaks in, so we had to give it up—not that it was ever as much good as the old ones nearer the Manor, you know."

"But, Mr. Strong, why can't the young lady come up, then? It there's a hole, surely she can be seen?"

"Mrs. Farmer, we're old friends, but you'll pardon me a-sayin' you're speaking rubbish, ma'am."

"Rubbish yourself! I'll tell Captain Williamson; he is at any rate a man, and is doin' somethin', not lazing away his time in gossip, and gazing at vacancies like a stuck pig!"

"If it's my husband"—began that Polly Strong; but I walked off and spoke to the captain, and said I—

"If you'll listen to me, sir, we may save the young lady yet, sir."

"Listen to you! I'll give you fit'y pounds if you'll show me a chance of saving her alive."

"If the tide's out, sir, we may. Get Strong, the overseer, and Major Martyn-Henry, and my husband, and a few more men, sir, and we'll try."

"What are you about?" whispered Charley: "you'll be putting your foot in it again. Lucy, this is no time for experiments!"

"Charley," says I, "I'm no fool, whatever you may think. Now, is the tide in or out?"

or out?"
"Out! out!" shouted the men. "Why?"
"Why? Ask Mr. Strong; he knows an opening into the mine yonder. Make him ge."

He didn't want any making, I will say.
He suddenly seemed to brighten up, and raa as fast as he could to the cliff, some hundred yards away. We looked after him, and then we heard him calling for a rope.

Hitch, slip, a dezen bridles were hitched off in two minutes. Those yeomanry never stripped for the "Coat-race" as quick as that, I know.

"There's the hole!" cried Mr. Strong.

"It's a rare bad spot; but it leads direct to "Volunteers!" shouted Major Henry.

"I go first and alone!" shouted Captain Williamson; "after me, who pleases; but I go first. I will resent any interference."

We all understood him. No one replied.

In half a minute his coat, waistcoat, and braces were off, and he was being fastened up underneath the shoulders with a bridle—reins were to be had in pienty—and almost as soon as I can tell you, Captain Williamson was going to what seemed certain death.

He would not wait for any one. Then Strong volunteered, and Miss Susan—bless her handsome pale face!—rode up with six carriage candles.

"There are more coming," she gasped. She was cheered all round. No one else had remembered the can ites—there were matches in plenty. The captain and Strong had been let down: then three other men, with more candles: then others—every one wanted to go—but the major said "Enough!"

By this time, as we ascertained afterwards, a number of men had collected at the entrance to the tunnel and begun to dig and throw away the rubbish and clay and "deborah," whatever that means, from the side of the hill.

So the search was proceeding at both ends. The suspense was awful. We women could do nothing but say what we would do when the young lady came up.

Then I began to think of old Rachrel and her prediction about the palmistry, and I felt sure—though, of course, no one could be actually sure—that they would both be saved.

So the time passed. Every minute seemed half an hour, and I suppose nearly three-quarters of an hour had really passed when the men at the pit-hole called out, "There's some one pulling the rope!"

All hands then buckled to and made ready. A faint kind of shout came up, and feeling a tug, the men pulled gradually, steadily, one behind the other in a long line, and with a "Yo, heave ho!" in time, like sailors.

Some had put their coats inside the hole so as to prevent the reins from cutting, and by degrees a figure was hauled up. on, horrible! horrible!

A lady! all torn and bleeding; her rid n_k-habit wrenched nearly off; her boots clean out as with a knile; her face as white as a sheet, on Captain Williamson's arm.

He was gripping the reins with one band, and I could see his bones actually coming through his sain with the terrib e grip he held.

when he got landed we rad to cut the reins and leave the piece clenched in his grasp. He couldn'nt open his hand; and when he sat down he fainted away. "He's dead!" shrieked some silly omen. "He's dead!"

"He is not!" shout

"He is not!" shouted a gentleman.
"Keep quiet, can't you? Come, bear a hand, some of you lasses, and be of use."
I was ready in a minute. We bathed his face, and by slow degrees got his hand un-clenched.

Miss Mather was carried away in a car-riage to the Hall, alive, but terribly inriage to the Hall, alive, but terribly injured, we feared. Such a fine, bright, brave girl she was, too. It seemed a thousand pities she should be disfigured.

As soon as Captain Williamson came to his senses he asked for her. We told him
Miss Mather was safe and carried home.
Then he was quiet, and said, "Did I save her?"

"Yes," replied the young doctor-for the gentleman was a doctor-"you have saved

I wondered how he knew. I looked ery much astonished, and asked him

"Hold your tongue, you stupid woman!" said he. "Don't you see we must keep up his spirits? He will sink if we don't. He's nearly exhausted, as it is."

"Stopid! Was 1? Well, I found out the old shaft, anyway," I muttered.
I then turned away, and went scross to Charley as soon as Captain Williamson had wen removed. We mounted into the trap and drove back. As we passed the landslip we found that the men had managed to perforate the debris and had penetrated into the long stoping tunnel in the hill which led to the workings.

We looked in and saw, or fancied we saw, how the accident had happened.

The kalloping horse had trodden on the rotten bank, the ground had given way and failen in a mass, shooting the animal and his rider into the mouth of the tunnel. Most fortunately Miss Mather had been thrown off-flung clear of the horse and the clay and stones—upon the trans-road in the tunnel.

Down this she had slid for several yards, and had fallen at last some five feet down a cutting at the side.

Had she continued in a forward direction would have tumbled down the old shaft to the bottom of the mine, and would have been kiled. Her groams guided the mon to the spot, and she was saved. Captain Williamson had brain fever. He was very ill for several weeks, but at length recovered. Miss Mather made a wonderful recovery, too, and after she got about again, I was sent for to Weuton Hall, where she was staying, and where Captain Williamson was also being nursed.

was introduced to her as she was seated in a study, looking at a picture she was paining. I could not help looking at the pauring. I could not help looking at the picture as I entered.

Her back was towards me, and I had a good stare at it. I declare it was the "Haunted Wood" of Scarsdale, where I had been many a time as a child. I could not help eatling out, and then Miss Margaret turned round.

Markaret turned round.

"M"s. Farmer?" she said.

"That is me, miss," said 1; "and right glad to see you up and about sgain."

"Toank you," she said. "Now, Mrs. Farmer, do you remember what Captain Williamson said before he went into that terrible shafe?"

"Yes, miss; he said no one but him hould save you."

"I don't mean that," she replied, with a blush. "I mean something about a re-

"Oh! he said he'd give me some money if I could help him to rescue you, miss; but of course one thinks nothing about that."

(I had thought of it, though, I must contess-for clothes are getting dearer, I be-

"Well, he has thought of it; and here is a note for you. Take it, please. Now come and tell me how you like my picture.

"It's beautiful, miss; the very place; it's the 'Haunted Wood' itself. I remember it well. I could tell you a story about

'Oh, do!" she cried, "I love a mystery. But first let me tell you that this picture is for you and your husband in recognition of your kindness. dness. Will you accept illiamson and I both wish it.' 117

"Thank you, miss, a hundred times; you are most kind; and may you and the captain be a very happy coaple. God bless

"I pray it may be so," she said softly. "I am sure we shall be happy, Mrs. Farmer. I hope I deserve to be his wite."

DON'T LEND YOUR KEYS .- The wiles of the criminal classes are often so ingenious that I can't help believing that if those who practice them were to turn their energies into other courses they would attain no small meed of honor and fame.

Some little time ago, for example, a burglar was caught red-handed in a strong-burglar was caught red-handed in a strongroom, opening a safe with a key that could not have been more perfect had it been supplied by the maker of the lock. The man, after having been convicted, was asked to say how he had obtsined the key. "Nothing easier," he recilied. "We knew who carried the key and what it was like, so me and my pals got into the same rail-way carriage with your manager when he was going nome one day. One of us had a bag which he couldn't open. "Has any gentleman a key?" he asked. Your manaver produced his bunch, and my pal, who had wax in his pain, while appearing to open his bag, took a likeness key of the safe. There's the secret for you."

Old Willis' Money.

BY MRS. M. M. LEWIS.

T was ten o'clock, and the sun came streaming through the long windows of the old fashioned room that Emma Gordon was busily engaged in dusting.

It was rather a pleasant room, built in the upper part of a storehouse, the lower story of which was still rented for that purpose by her grandfather.

But Aaron Richardson, her grandfather had failed long ago, so that even this storehouse was mortgaged to Samuel Willis, or "Old Sam," as he was called by those who never ceased wondering how he laid his hands on so much.

Samuel owned the great boiler factory which fenced in their storehouse, and in fact he had his capacious hand on almost the whole of that retired, outlandish neigh-

But Emma was not thinking of Mr. Willis' prosperity, but of a more fruitful subject; sixteen years old to-day, her grandfather very old, and what was to become of her when he was gone? Were not these sad prospects?

As she was musing thus she heard the sound of whistling. It proceeded from Mr. Willis' new clerk Arthur, she knew; in some way related to him she believed, yet so distantly, they had nothing in common but the name of Willis. Emmy blushed, but the lad bowed and smiled and disappeared from the window. After this Arthur would re-appear to bow and smile, and this continued for a long time, but there is always sure to come a time when young people exchange words instead of bows and smiles at these childlike, stolen interviews.

Arthur "commenced it" by begging a little bunch of geraniums and ear-drops, and because he could not reach them from the factory windows, took occasion to call upon Emma and her grandfather.

One day the latter said to Emma abruptly:

"You know Mr. Willis told me he was getting old and rheum-tic and had no one to care for him but his bousekeeper; to care for him but his housekeeper; and I says that wasn't the case here, and that I had you, my dear," Emma grew more attentive as her grandlather proceeded, "but I had no money."

""Weil, old Willis,' says he, "isn't that odd; each of us wants what the other has got. Suppose we make a bargain as they do on 'change; you give me Emma and I will give money, enough for you and here." will give money enough for you and her. A home is just what I need for her, says I, 'and she 'an't the girl to refuse a good offer.' So Em, you see the compact's complete and he will come here to-morrow."

We cannot wonder that Emma was silent considerably indignant when he and added.

"Mr. Willis offered to settle $20,000 on you in your own name and he has no relations nearer than Arthur." Emma brightened; to her reflective mind the gift of $20,000 might atone for a great deal of attention from Mr. Willis, and were they not poor, so poor?

So the affair was consummated, the gift papers signed, and a private marriage took place between the maid and this man of sixty, without Arthur being told anything of the matter.

One morning he resolved to ascertain whether rumor was to be relied upon; it was the morning on which Emma was to go to her new home; he called to her from the factory window.

"There aren't many girls who would act as you have done."

"There aren't many who would have had the copportunity," she retorted, angry in her turn.

"That's true, Arth," struck in Aaron, "That's true, Arth," struck in Aaron, "let me tell you few middle-aged gentlemen act as my triend here. I say give a good girl a good chance, hal ha!" and the grandfather laughed for his share in the the condition of things,' "You 800 observed old Willis who now the scene and sought to shift it to his own advantage, "she will not change from me to you for the worth of all your talk. Don't be a fool and stand in your own light."

"I tell you, Mr. Willis," returned Arthur, scarcely knowing what words he used in his confusion, "I'll inarry no woman but Mrs. Willis."

"Very well, sir, very well, you'll have to wait a while yet," and with these words and a flourish of his marriage certificate, Mr. Willis would gladly conclude, but Aaron, hearing Arthur's despairing sigh at the sight of the paper, added:

"Take my advice and make the best of

At this juncture Arthur feeling like victim among so many counselors was about to depart, when Mr. Willis, the elder, wheeling him back so as to face Emma bade the two make friends. As he looked into her calm face shaded by the dark blonde hair it was impossible to be very angry with Emma.

So things went on for months, then Arthur suddenly announced his intention of going to Japan on a long commercial voyage. Emma had heard of this Japanese voyage for some weeks and supposed that Mr. Throckmorton, the manager would be selected for this post.

To this man Emma had conceived what Mr. Willia termed an unreasonable aversion. In regard to Arthur's trip, Mr. Throckmorton informed Willis declar d him toat Arthur requested to go in his piace, and when closely questioned by the old housekeeper and herself, to this statement Arthur offered no denial.

He represented that the position of foreign agent was both agreeable and profitable, and should be become wearied of the Japs he would travel about and visit all parts of the world. Finally, and this was on the day of his departure, he promised to write often and let Mrs. Willis know how he was coming on. But whather know how he was coming on. But whether the writing was for her own or Mrs. Willis' benefit, Meg had no time to inquire. One thing was certain, Arthur would soon be far away on the ocean and might not see them again in many, many years.

Meg belonged to that small but earnest sect who are called Millerites, from constantly looking forward to the Earth's coming to an end; yet she, inured as she was to a contemplation of the awful and supernatural, was totally unprepared the revelations of the ensuing day.

At 11 A. M. Mr. Willis was found dead, reclining in his office chair.

He was in the habit of going to the factory at 10 A. M., returning, lunching, and again going to his office. But when the rush of business was urgent he would remain until 11:30 or even 12. His family did not miss him, therefore, at 11.

A coroner's jury was summoned and as they did not know what cause to assign, brought in a verdict of heart disease; there was an intimation of poison, but the inti-mation was abandoned.

Emma dreaded publicity; still Mr.
Willis had shown no trace of the disease, and she was not estished. Arthur's sudden disappearance and the fact that he did not acquaint them with the name of the steamer or the line upon which he was to sail, looked like evidence against him.

Could the youth from jealousy, from envy, from any cause whatever have been base enough to commit the crime?

She shuddered at the thought, yet even in that case she would not be his accuser. Heaven would bring the guilty one to justice. One thing she was resolved upon; should be ever presume to address her, thinking time would wash away suspicion, she would on no account answer an epistle from the murderer of so good a husband.

Upon the death of the latter, his affection for her increasing as their ties strengthened, she found herself not only in possession of the expected $20,000 but of fully one half his immense property; the other half he left to Arthur.

Emma instructed her lawyer to make this over to him; nor was this a difficult task, for Arthur had written to the housekeeper within a month after his exit, and the latter, believing no ill of her favorite,

After this he addressed two letters to Emma; she wondered at his temerity, but was satisfied with leaving them unnoticed. The pure do not wish to dwell long on the shadow of evil.

New Year's days came and went again, yet everything went on in much the same course at the old mansion.

Every day Aaron became more feeble, and every day Emma found comfort and relief in the care of her grandfather.

The business, meanwhile, was conducted by Mr. Throckmorton. At Mr. Willis' death the manager brought in a large ex-pense bill, but as Emma had not then recovered from the shock occasioned by it she did not seek to question business in cumbrances. Content was she, the once poor girl she remembered herself, with the portion alloted to her.

But Mr. Throckmorton had lately been subject to frequent bodily troubles; his physicians had given up all hopes of recovery when he sent for Emma and made her promise, whether upon a review he had served her family well or ill, she would not revenge herself upon his innocent wife and child; she readily complied.

Judge of her consternation when in a few: ours he went for her again and con-tessed poisoning her husband to conceal his fraudulent involvements.

"How did young Mr. Willis go abroad so mysteriously?"

"I managed it," he gasped, "begged him if he had ever loved, not to separate me from my wife who was then unable to accompany me; he said he was as well there as anywhere.

Soon after his declaration the last agony followed and the manager where all this while was Arthur? He left her a careless boy, to return a hand-some, hale man of thirty.

On, those never to be forgotten days when Arthur welcomed to the one spot on earth which seemed to him like home, sat and held her hand without fear of wrong or denial, then told her of his wanderings round the world.

But why might not all this have happened years before? Arthur was then a more years before? Arthur was then a more fervent though not a more constant admirer, and wealth might as truly have been the possession of that particular Willis as at the present day,

"Ah, the love of money," you will say,
"that enticing root of evil that entwines itself about the noblest things of life!"
Nay rather, why is there a destiny which keeps us from the real objects of when were it not for this we might have enjoyed them years before?

Such were the inquiries that would suggest themselves to a philosopher, bent on an investigation of the human mind, versed in the study of human nature.

But Emma Gordon's was not a disposition to brood long on these problems, and in the sobering retrospect of her peculiar prospects, amid the still atmosphere of her family circle she passed the remainder of her days.

A Guardian's Freak.

BY J. P. THATCHER.

Thad been a very trying day for Miss Withelmina Van Norden. In the first place, she had been late to breaktast. and after hastily rising from her narrow couch, and looking with considerable irricouch, and looking with considerable irritation at her watch, grinding away time as if it were nothing, omitted a generous half of the usual plunge, thus missing an invigorating tonic to her spirits.

She dressed herself with great outward effect, but felt much inward annoyance as she looked at her eyes and swollen underlids, each pencilled with a narrow dark ring which told of late hours the night be, fore, and perhaps as much of restless fore, and perhaps as much of restless, heavy sleep after its excitement.
"What a fright I am!" she ejaculated,

"What a fright I am!" she ejaculated, giving one of her quick, disdainful glances into the mirror. "So much for card-playing by stealth! I am looking worse than usual this morning; and the boys are coming over, too, from Amherst to play a game of tennis. Well, never mind! I am not in love with any of them, and if they are with me, it must be in spite of haggard eyes and mouth drawn down at the eyes and mouth frawn down at the corners. Perhaps they will take it that I have been spending nights of restless tears on their account!"

She laughed outright at the idea. Then she passed out of the door with a smile, and her step rang firmly down the corrider and the two flights of stairs which led to the dining hall, before the entrance of which she stopped to compose her face, for she knew she should encounter the reproacuful gaze of the matron, who insisted upon remaining in the room until she saw every girl out of it. every girl out of it.

Still she marched boldly up to her accustomed place, and bowed "good morning" with grave politeness to Miss A, who returned the salute with grave dig-

There was but one girl left at Will's table-Fannie Browne

"Good morning, Will," she said. "How are you feeling this lovely day, after the hurlyburly's done and the battle?—but hurlyburly's done and the battler—but enough. It would be cruel to say the rest after your experience last night."

"Hush," said Will. "or we shall be overheard! The dove is fluttering in her corner nest," she added, seeing Miss A—turn her ear to catch their voices. "If we are overheard, added to stolen fun! By the way do you have teams with us this after. way, do you play tennis with us this after-noon?"

"No, I am going to take a long tramp with two members of my club, up to Williamston and back."

Williamston and back."

"What are you made of?" asked Will, gloomlly. "I am a wreck, and can hardly crawl to chapel. Why, there's the bell. Wait a moment; let us die together?"

They hastened across the campus and joined the long procession of girls that filed into the narrow doorway and up the broad oaken staircase, passing the symbolic window inscribed with a Greek motto of which it was the proper thing to felgal ignorance, then past the pictures and casts, the Ariadne and Father Niie, the lovely, down-gazing, mutitated Psyche, upon down-gazing, mutilated Psyche, upon which Will did not bestow her usual glance of admiration—she was not in the mood to reverence soul that morning-she went on to the large light hall used for worship, walking matches (conventionally known as receptions), concerts, and commencement exercises.

General L— presided at one end of the room, and the portrait of the foundress at the other, so that between benignity and benediction bliss ought to have been compiete.

The usual hush fell, the wonted prayers were read, and the "amen" and rush for the door occurred simultaneously. The the door occurred simultaneously. The morning passed quickly.

At luncheon Will was in high spirits, and afterwards hastened to don her tennis dress, to be ready for "the boys." They arrived in due time, Fred Hastings, her friend's brother, and his class-mate, Mr. Rullard. Bullard.

They were a merry party. Will's eyes were no longer baggard, and the color returned to her cheeks, not base enough to desert her before her young friends. "How superb she is!" thought poor Fred. "I must ask her to-day, if I have the chance."

chance.

And the chance came to him. They went to the gymnasium for a dance, and after changing partners two or three times, Mr. Bullard and Miss Nellie Hastings being absorbed in a conversation near the platform, Fred led Will into the farther corner and plunged in, like the boy he was.

"Will," he said, "you must know that for a long time I have loved you."
"I did not know it," she replied, wonderingly. Then impulsively, "Oh, it is use-less for any man but one to love me! I was given away by my uncle almost as soon as I was born."

"Who is the man?" asked Fred, chokingly.
"I do not know," she answered.
"Uncle will teil me only his name, which "Would you not marry the man you loved?" Fred asked.

"I would at any cost; but I have never loved anyone," she added. 'On I don't know," she almost moaned. "If I opposed uncle he would leave me penniless, friendless, and I feel so fettered, irritated. I never realized it all as I do to-day—I cannot even weer to a convention of the manufacture.

"And the man who loves you is as much condemned as you are," said Fred, fully. "But why do we talk?" Y not love me! Is there any hope that you ever will? Tell me frankly, Will."

"There is no hope," she answered. "But you have no rival in Jonas Smith, for I swear that that man shall never be my accepted lover or husband. I will turn accepted lover or husband. I will turn every man I can into my adorer, and then he shall suffer. Why not?" she added, butterly. "I must."

"How foolish," thought Fred, "to bind this spirited girl in such a way."

The chain, once felt, galled her sorely, but he could do nothing.

"Ramember, Will," he said, with mingled regret and generosity, "when you do love, I will do all I can to help you."

"Thank you, Fred. You are a noble leilow!" tooking up into his face with genine admiration.

une admiration.

Will went to the theatre that night, a rare treat; but everything in the play that hore on love strained her sympathies to the utmost.

It was quite distressing.

'Decidedly I need broadening," she said, when she had reached her room.
'I'll go upstairs and see Sue."
She found her friend (the prettiest little "dig" in Smith College) studying the English of Shakspeare from the play of Julius Cassar."

Just the thing!" thought Will. Giorious old play! It will sweep away the clouds, and unske the universe look as clear and vast as it really is."

And an hour later she retired in a better mood; but dreamed of Fred-poor Fred!

A week later saw Will and Neil Hastings settled in the home of the latter, enjoying the vacation hugely.

There was a succession of euchre and whist parties, good luck and bad luck, dancing entertainments and straw rides; and Will enjoyed the ease and naturalness of country life and pleasures. As for the young men, they adored her; but she was too real, too earnest, to be a coquette. One day, a letter from Fred was eagerly opened by Nellie.

opened by Nellie.
"I hope he is well?" said Will
"Yes; quite well, he says. He sends his love to you," she added, reading down the page. "The rude fellow! I must tell him age. "A he would be the says." behave himself. Are you offended,

"If No; Fred and I are old friends, you know," she replied satisfactors know," she replied, rather confusedly, ashamed of herself for having betrayed consciousness, "How my mind does run to such stuff lately!" she mused. She soon made an excuse to leave the

She soon made an excuse to leave the room, and went for a walk.
"I wonder," thought Neilie, "if there is anything between them? Perhaps she cares for him, and heis trifling with her."
The cloud called there by this thought did not leave her face until she was summoned to meet callers in the sitting-room. They proved to be a friend from the village and a new acquisition from town—a gentieman a new acquisition from town—a gentieman with the air of fine breeding which makes a man irresistibly attractive.

"What a superb-looking specimen!" thought Neil. "How Will would admire him! They must meet."

As there was to be a card party at her bouse that year, evening and party at her was to be a card party at her bouse that year, evening and party at her bouse that year.

house that very evening, sue invited Mr. Cruger to attend, telling him that she had as a guest a friend whom she would like to meet-a Miss Van Norden from London. "I am much gratified by the invitation,"

he replied, 'and shall have the honor to present myself this evening. The name of Van Norden is familiar to me." After some further conversation the callers took their leave, promising to return in the evening.

Passing out from the porch they met Will, and Mr. Cruger was betrayed into bestowing upon her an admiring glance, under which the girl blushed vividity.

"What a lovely woman!" he thought.

That evening he said to her, after being presented, "I met you this morning, I

You have remembered me a long while," she responded, smilingly.
"A long while?" he repeated. "I could remember you for an eternity!"

He paused abruptly, fearing he had gone

Will was silent, her eves downcast. Suddenly he leaned forward, and asked,

"Will you give me one of the roses you are wearing?" ngly she unfastened a rose from her corsage: and, as he took it, he kissed her "This seems to me," thought Will, "very much like love at first sight; or else the man's a confirmed flirt."

At which supposition she sighed. After that Mr. Cruger was constantly with Will.

It was evidently a case of love on both sides, and vet neither seemed to learn to the thoughts, life, and circumstances of the other. Absorbed in the present, they thought not of the future.

There was to be a drive, one evening, during the latter part of Will's visit; but she stayed at home to have a good under-standing with herself. She knew Mr. Cru-ger was going on that drive. She would remain at home. He had not been near her all day. He did not care for her, that was evident, or he would have spoken.

When Nell had gone to join the party, which was to meet and start from the house of a friend, Will sat and chatted merrily with Mrs. Hastings until that lady was called away to attend to some household matters, and she was left alone, but not for Her musings were interrupted by a ring at the coor, and a card was handed

It was Mr. Cruger's, and he followed the maid almost immediately.

She rose to meet him.
"Good evening, Mr. Cruger. How does it happen that you are not among the rest of the pleasure-seekers?"

"Because my pleasure was here," he re-plied, with something more than mere gal-lantry. "I have not seen you all day. Early this morning I went to town. When I returned, Miss Williams told me you were not going to ride. I feared you were ill, and came to you at once. And now," he went on, "may I speak as frankly as I would like?"

Will blushingly smiled assent.
"Then, sweet Will," he said, "will you promise here and now to become my wife?"

She drew back slightly.

"Listen to me. I owe you frankness. If you marry me, you must take me in poverty."

He laughed. "Is that all? You will not wed a poor man. I can give you what you ought to have. There is no excuse, dearest."

"I do not look for excuses," size replied. "But—but I have been designed for some one else."

"Do you love him?" "No. Can you ask that? I do not even know the man, and hope I never shall. My uncle, who is also my guardian, has tried from my earliest remembrance to accustom me to the idea that I am to marry someone called Jonas Smith. He lives in London, I fancy, Lut I know nothing about him."

"I do not recognize the name," said the

"If I do not marry that mansumed Will, lifting her earnest eyes to his. "But, oh, I caunot! How can I, now that I know you?'

Here she stopped to stifle a sob.
"My darling, it shall never be. You shall never submit to such tyranny."
"It is not tyranny," she said, "it is caprice. But uncle's freaks are his principles, and they strengthen with his years. A thousand times I have heard the praises of Jonas Smith sounded; his devotion to business, his purity of life, his correctness of judgment—in short, his marvelous perfection. Unless I marry him my uncle will disinherit me. I thought I ought to tell you this. If you now regret what you have "Regret?" said he. "Regret is only for those who do not love. Will, you shall not give me up.

"I shall not; I will not!" she answered. And Stuyvesant Cruger read in her face the sweetest story in the world to him. "Then you will marry me?"

"What is your uncle's name?" he asked, after a pause which was eloquent to them both.

"Welcome Gale," "Welcome Gale!" he gasped. "Why, Wili, he is my partner! This is a complication!"

The next evening the uncle in question drove from the club to his home in Kensington, and retiring to the library to write some letters, found one lying on his desk from Will, announcing her recent engagement to Mr. Cruger.

"Well, well," he chuckled, "it is just as I knew it would be! She has seen him at I knew it and has fallen in love with him, as I said—just as I said. How little she dreams that he is my Jonas Smith! Now if I had told her all about the boy, and let her run down to my office, where she could see him every day, it would have been all up with my little scheme."

He fairly beamed with delight as he snatched up a pen and scribbled:

"DEAR WILL:-Caught by a trick, Miss Defiance! All's fair in love and war. Cruger is the very man I had set my heart on for you. He is my Jonas Smith! But then you can never marry him, you know! "UNCLE WELCOME."

Mr. Gale sent this the next morning, and received in reply a telegram:

"You have fibbed, sir! His name is not

The wire responded:

"So have you-you swore you never would!"

The new term had opened at college, Upon one evening Will's set were assem-bled in the "Retreat," of which Fannie Browne was mistress.

"Will you join us in a game of whist?" said she to Will.
"Yes," replied Will, without moving,

"Yes," replied will, without moving, and looking at the Apollo in the corner with dreamy admiration.
"Come, wake up," said Fannie. "I don't want to make myself disagreeable, but what means this big diamond on your hand with a finger all to itself? I would not mention it, but once or twice of late you have acted suspiciously. Come now you have acted suspiciously. Come, now, confess and feel better."

"Well," said Will, "I'll own the truth. I have taken a fatal step. She raised her ringed hand to save further explanation.

"Poor girl!" said Fannie. "Is it awful?" "Yes," replied Will, "I feel it keenly," with a quiet gleam of happiness in her

"I know," said Fannie. "I had a touch of it once myself," applying herself to her oysters. "Too far gone to eat?" she ad-

"No," answered Will, "never that, But come, let us have our game." When the meeting broke up, Will said, "At the next walking-match look for a tall man with blue eyes. He is the one I am to marry; lon the market.

but his name is not Jonas Smithl Good night."

ERRORS ABOUT DOGS.

Pliny, the ancient Roman writer, tells us Pliny, the ancient Roman writer, tells us that, if we cut off the tip of a dog's tail within forty days from its birth, it will never go mad, and that the best of the litter is the whelp which gets its eyesight last, or that which the mother carries first into the kennel. Of the dog's faithfulness he has notable instances. It has been known to throw itself into the flames when its mas-ter's funeral pyre was kindled.

It will breed with the tiger. The Indians eross their dogs in that way. The first and second crosses are too savage to use; the third can be trained.

No matter how fierce a dog is, it will No matter how fierce a dog is, it will never attack you if you sit down—Homer says the same thing in the Odyssey—and it may be silenced by holding to it a brand snatched from a funeral-pyre. When cremation was given up, this recipe had to be modified; and for the brand was substituted "the hand of glory," which credulous medieval burglars used to corry, with the view of keeping the watch-dog quiet.

view of keeping the watch-dog quiet.

The most fighting breed was the Molossian, a splendid sample of which the King of Albania gave to Alexander the Great when he was going to India. Alexander had bears, stags, and bears slipped to it, but the dog lay motionless; whereat the King's anger was roused that such a noble form should cover so sluggish a spirit, and norm should cover so sluggish a spirit, and he bade the dog be killed, sending a message to the giver that the gift had proved unworthy of them both. Waereupon was sent another like dog, with the warning that the first dog's inaction in presence of small game was not due to sluggishness or contempt, such dogs being used to be matched against elephants and lions. matched against elephants and lions.

Alexander at once tried him with a lion, which he slew, and then set him at an elephant, round which he circled, baying loudly, and with all his bristles erect, attacking tirst on one side and then on the other, slipping in and avoiding the ele-phant's stroke whenever he got the chance.

At last the eleghant grew dizzy, and, falling down, was made a prey by its smallsized antagonist.

Unitke bees, and rate, and cows, and severat other creatures, dogs can never be in-duced to drink anything stronger than water, at least so Pliny says. Hence the R man nickname, "a dog's lunch," for a Note how seldom or never Shakspeare has a good word for the dog. In that he falls behind the ancients, who (though they freely use "dog" as a word of reproseb bear frequent testimony to the faithfulness of the animal.

No poet, nowadays, could speak better of a pet mastiff than Homer in the Odyssey does of that dog, well-nigh twenty years old, that recognized Ulysses when his own father had forgotten him.

Dogs were yearly crucified at Rome, because one night they forgot their duty, and let to the geese the task of giving notice that the Gauls were scaling the capitol. Priny speaks of pupples' flesh being eaten, just as if Rome had learned from China:

"At solemn festivals in honor of the gods, they forget not to serve up certain dishes of suckling whelps' flesh."

THE SUN.—The sun is a vast body one million two hundred and sixty thousand times as large and nearly three hundred and twenty-seven thousand times as heavy as the earth. That which we see of it ordi-nary is a white-hot central mass which is really only a part of the great globe. Next to this there is a beautifully-colored envelope from five thousand to ten thousand nailes in thickness, called the chromosphere, while outside this is a comparatively dense atmosphere, or corons, stretching away for at least one hundred thousand miles; while beyond that again there is a further atmosphere consisting of large exent of hydrogen, the lightest substance known, reaching, it may be, a million miles or more farther into space.

Look at the sun shining brightly above us; it seems a picture of quietude and grandeur. In point of fact it is something very different. There is nothing with which man is acquainted that is in such wild confusion as the surface of the sun. Talk of startling volcanic eruptions, earth-quakes, and storms—the violence of all terrestrial commotions since the world was inhabited would not equal one hour's dis-turbance on the face of that boiling caldron we call the sun.

cyclone on the earth's surface that whirls round at the rate of one hundred inities an hour is a hurricance carrying all before it, but there are solar whirlwinds and fiery floods that sweep along at one hundred miles a second.

An eruption of Vesuvius entombs Pompeli; but there are momentary and un-ceasing eruptions on the sun in which the whole earth would meit with fervent heat and be engulfed, so as to leave not a rack behind except an inappreciable addition to the sun's gaseous atmosphere

No one by merely conversing with a fish ever succeeded in drawing him out. Merely conversing with a Warner's Log Cabin Plaster would not draw out the pain in the back, but an application of it would give relief at once.

EVERY one is the artisan of his own fortune. If you wish a fortune, keep healthy by the use of Warner's Log Cabin Sarsaparilla, which purifies the blood and thus gives health and strength. Largest bottle

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

A letter from Japan tells that "another way (to worship Buddha, in the temple at Koto) is to chew the prayer paper, and when soft throw it in the form of a pellet at the god, through a wire screen. If it goes through and sticks on the god, the prayer will be answered. If it hits on the screen, it is no good. Some of the gods are thickly plastered with this schoolboy mis-

Florida promises to become a large producer of opium. The poppy grows there very readily, and larger than anywhere else in the United States. Sixteen plants will produce an ounce of opium, and an acre should give a profit of $1,000. As the plants will thrive among trees, the land on which are young and non-bearing orange orchards can be utilized while the trees are reaching maturity.

The first "born lady" in England to go into business was the Honorable Mrs. Maberley, who sold milk, and had carts and bill-heads bearing her own name. She personally supervised her shop, and was successful. Another girl of birth and breeding opened a shop in London for the exhibition and sale of burse decembers. exhibition and sale of house decorations of all sorts. She holds her own with male competitors in the same line.

Princess de Metternich is one of the ugliest woman imaginable: she said of herself when in Paris: "I am the beatdressed monkey in the city," and she really had the courage to found the "Club of Ugly Women," a club in which there were only the courage to found the "Club of Ugly Women," a club in which there were only five members. A correspondent describing her, says: The shoulders, uncovered to the last degree, were ornamented with sears of every size and shape, the mouth was like that of an African, but the grace and elegance could not be denied."

They tell down East of a poor fellow who They tell down East of a poor fellow who possessed a remarkably fat hog, and who also owed a rich man. The hog was about all the property the poor debtor had worth levying on, and the law exempted a man's only pig. One day the debtor, meeting the creditor, said: "You need another pig; let me send you a nice little one." The poor man was astonished. "Why, I owe you for the hog I've got now." he stamyou for the hog I've got now," he stammered. "Never mind; you need another one, and I'll send it," and he did, and the little pig was put in the pen by the side of the fat one. In less than an hour the con stable came and attached the fat hog and it away, and thus the law and the rich man were satisfied.

The following story is considered as suggestive of a moral as an Æsop fable: A traveler in making change at the railroad station at Concord, N. H., gave the ticket agent a five-dollar gold piece for a penny. The agent saw it and handed the coin back. The man thanked him, put it into his pocket, pulled out several coins and gave the agent one, and the agent brushed it into the drawer with the pennies. After the train started the traveler jumped oil and rushed back, saying, "I give you a five-tollar gold piece for a penny," "Yes," said the agent, "and I gave it back to you. "But I gave it to you again. Look and see." The agent looked and there was the gold piece. The man had made the same mistake twice.

An exciting scane was caused or. Chestnut street, Boston, recently, by a large wharf rat which emerged from a cellar. After causing a stampede among p destrians, especially the lemales, the rat, probably more scared than the people, dashed for a passing express wagon and sought refuge under the scat of the driver. Al-though a robust 200 pound man, the latter gave full possession of his team to the ro-dent, jumping from his seat, and, catching the horse's head, all the while loudly cati-ing for assistance. With horse car and wagon travel blocked, and an immense number of onlookers standing about, at-fairs remained until a slender youth came forward, caught the rat and put it and the

A convict who has been in prison for two years at Trenton, N. J., whore he is serving an eight years' sentence for robbery, will not eat while any one is looking at him. Ever since his imprisonment, it is asserted, the has not spoken a word to any of his fellow-convicts or keepers, and pretends not to understand any one who speaks to him. His wife visits him, we companied by their child, but even then he does not alter his manner. Often his wife entreats him to speak to her, but he regards her with the most stolid indifference. The vain endeavors of the unfortunate weman to induce him to notice the baby and herto induce him to notice the baby and her self are pitiful. Cries, caresses and en-treaties are all lost upon him as completely as if he were an iron coan. Now and then he will pace up and down his cell live a wild animal in a cage, only s opping when he talls down from sheer excausion?

Good Wages - A Dollar an Hour,

Enterprising, ambitions people of both sexes and all ages should at once write to Stinson & Ca. Portland Marne, learning thereby, by return math how trey poin make $1 per hour and upwards, and live athome. You are started free. Capital not needed. Work pleasant and easy a 1 can do it. All is new and free; write and see; then if you conclude not to go by work, to harm is done. A rare opportunity. Grand, rushing success rewards every worker.

Our Young Folks.

BY K. KINGSLEY.

NCE by the seashore lived a woman NCE by the seasore fived a woman and her two daughters, and the name of the one was fra and the other Elthea. Ira was always patient, and Elthea never; Ira busy, and Elthea die; fra always obedient, while Elthea only laughed in her mother's face. And yet the mother loved her the best of the two.

One day there came an old woman to the

"I am cold," said the old woman. "Dance and get warm then," answered

But Ira gave her her own seat by the

"I am hungry," said the old woman.
Elthes yawned; but Ira went at once to the cupboard.
"Stop!" said her mother; "there is hardly supper enough now."

"I will give her my share, then," answered ira.

And she brought out a little cup and a spoon, and poured in it milk, white and cold as snow, and broke up bread that was fine and white, and gave it to the old woman, who devoured it all in a mo-

When it was bed-time—"You must sleep on the floor, old woman," said Eithes; "there is no bed for you."

But Ira interiered.
"I will give her my bed; my bones are younger."

Sthe old woman went up with Eithea and her mother to bed, and Ira lay down on the boards near the fire. All night long Eithea dreamed of dragons and ugly giants; but Ira, of roses and diamond pal-

In the morning the old woman got up, and hobbied off without a word. And Eithea laughed at Ira, who had given up her seat, her supper, and her bed, without even getting a word of thanks in return, but ira said nothing.

Time went on till one day there came to the cottage a herald, and with the herald were thirty men in golden armor, and in front of him two horses, white as snow, with saddles of veivet, and silken reins embroidered with gold.

"Eithea and Ira," cried the herald, "King Panduif desires you to come to court. Prince Gendo chooses him a wife, and your names are found written in the list of beautiful maidens,"

"Eithea can go, but let Ira stay at home," sail the mother. "No one will look at her beside her sister."

the beraid.

"The King must be obeyed," answered the heraid. "Ira must go too." So Ira went up to get ready; but Elthea was so angry that she tore her sister's dress into shreds, and threw all her combs and plus out of the window; and Ira was obliged to go to court in her gray stuff dress, and with her long golden curls hang-ing all about her shoulders, while Eithea sat up in her saddie, stiff and stately, with a high shell comb, and a blue satin dress, never once turning her head, lest some one should think that she and Ira were in company.

Half-way in the forest they met the old woman to whom Ira had given her bed and supper.

"I want to go to court, too," screamed she. "Take me up on your fine white horse."

Esthea tossed her head; but Ira stopped and took her up.

"Do have more sense!" cried Elthea. Remember, you may yet be the sister queen, and might as well cultivate a little decent dignity."

But Ira said nothing, till they reached the palace gate.

"Ho! ho!" shouted the warders. "Here comes the Prince's bride to court, dressed in a gray stuff dress, with an old granny behind on the saddie!"

And all the men-st-arms laughed, and Eithea rode on ahead in a violent flurry, iest anyone should guess that they were

So they came to the palace itself, and the Lard Chamberlain came out to meet

And to Eithea he gave a spacious room with a green and gold ceiling, and a per-fumed oath; while Ira and the old woman were stowed away in a little turret chamand scarce enough room to turn round in. "Spin, child," said the old woman; "it is well never to be idle,"

Ira looked about her, but sa: nothing, "What shall I spin? There is nothing

"Brush down all the cobwebs," said the

And as it was twenty-five years since the reom had been swept, Ira soon had a goodly

Then the old woman took out of her bosom a golden distaff and diamond wheel, and all that week Ira spun, till there lay on the cot bed the loveliest robe and veil ever was rose-tinted and full of golden stars.

And as no one brought them either breaklast, dinner, or supper, every night. at sunset, the old woman called loudly of the window, and there came flying in a pitcher of milk and a bag of bread.

So the second week came, and the old again, 'Spin, child; it is well never to be idle."

"I see nothing here," answered irs, "but a single blade of grass."

"Take that, then," said the old woman. And so all that week Ira spun, till the littie room was half-full of linen clothes, fine and white as snow.

So the third week came, and there arose a mighty stir in the palace and court. And there came a hundred cooks, a hundred waters, and a hundred waters in at the great gate. And Ira could hear music, and see the fair damsels, who had been summoned to court, going into the hall of audience two by two.

"Go vou down also," said the old woman. "The Prince chooses him a wife to-day." But Ira looked down at her gray dress, and shook her head.

Then the old woman bade her take it off, and put on the linen cloths; and over that she placed the rose-hued robe; and from out of her bosom she took a crown of great diamonds, in which light seemed to dance and leap; and about her head she drailed the starry veil; and on her arms she clasp-ed bracelets of milk white pearls, and over all she threw a mantle of rare white lace. Then she touched a little cracked glass hanging over the table with her distaff, and it grew to be a long mirror in a golden

"Look," said the old woman.

But Ira started back afraid, for her face was glorious. "Fear not, it is the beauty of Patience shining out in your features," said the old woman. "I am Lills, queen of the fairies; but I had no rarer gift to bestow. I could only lead you to its reward. Go down now, and fear nothing."

So ira went with stately steps down the winding stairs to the marble paved hall, and the Lord Chamberlain bowed to the very earth before her, and called twelve pink pages and ten maldens to attend her to the great hall of audience.

There were all the lovely damsels of the kingdom, and the King and Queen on their thrones, and the Prince. And each damset was mincing and fluttering, and pushing and crowding to get nearer the Prince; but still be kept on till be came to Ira, standing fair and patient at the lower end of the ball. "This shall be my wife," cried the

And in an instant the heralds blew their trumpets, the bands began to play, and the whole court shouted fill it was out of breath, "Long live Princess Ira!"

THE LITTLE SPIDER.

BY L. R.

NCE upon a time, a little spider that had spun his web many and many a time, only to be disturbed by the housemaid's broom, was at a sorry loss where to find a corner to make another

"I think," said he, with a shake of his wise little head—"I think I will spin on the nursery wall. It seems to me that folks are not half so particular about their nurseries as the other rooms, and I do love children," said the cunning little spider. He went to work with a will, and spun a wonderful web, with bedroom, parlor, and a curious pair of winding stairs, up which many a poor little fly was dragged for Mr.

pider's dinner. How happy he was, listening to the children's prattle, quite forgetting the housemaid's broom, until one bright morning when he was surprised by an unusual noise in the aursery.
"What can be the matter?" thinks he,

hooh-boo-booh!

"Cut your tinger?" cried nurse, excitedly running over to where a little girl in a white pinalore was crying lustily. "Mercy met" she exclaimed. 'Get me a cobweb, someone, quick! The very best thing in the world for a cut."

Now the little spider away up on the high wall trembled. A call for cobwebs, He knew what that meant—that the pretty little house that cost him so many hours of hard labor was to be taken from him to bind the little girl's finger.

"I had better get out myself," thought he, or goodness knows what might become

Slowly he came down the little winding stair and crept to the other side of the Olice again he saw his enemy, the house lutie spider was homeless.

He had never feit quite as unhappy since the morning he had seen his mother, a fine fat spider, cruelly put to death by a wicked who drove a darning-needle through But towards little girls the spider bore no hatred. He rather liked them, as they had never harmed him; they would only scream and ran away when he came amongst them.

done some good, and now I must spin an

All went well until the lady of the house, on coming into the nursery one morning, was both surprised and shocked on seeing deciare," she said, holding up her hands in horror, "there is a great ugly spider! I must have Betty come at once and take it down.'

"Do let me stay!" pleaded the little

But no one heard him. Once again he have been homel as were it not that just as Betty held the broom aloft to sweep him down, a little girl with yellow curis

and a white pinalore came running up.
"Stop, Betty!" she cried, tugging at the housemaid's gown. "You must not kill the little spider or spoil his pretty web. When I cut my finger, and it bled and bled, nurse wrapped the cobweb around it and made it better."

The little lady was accustomed to having ner own way: I am inclined to think that she was a trifle "spoiled."

When mamma learned of her little girl's wish, she was pleased to see evidence of gratitude, so permitted the spider to remain just where it was.

He is there now, away up on the nursery wall, and has grown to be a great fat old fellow, puffed up with flies and conceit. He was heard to remark one morning, not very long ago, as he climbed up his wind-ing stairs, "Surely one good turn deserves another."

NINA'S KITTEN.

BY K. K.

HE loves me so." This was the song

Nina's tabby kitten Tibs sang all the day, and no other.
"She loves me so; she loves me so."
And the love Tibs bore her little mistress giving love for love-stole from her heart to her small homely face, and filled it with a strange beauty, that people stopped to pat her, and say, "What a lovely little kit-

And when Nina answered, "Yes, I love her better than anything in the world," Tibs would steal closer to her, and rub her wee tabby head against her feet, or sometimes she climbed up and nestled on her shoulder among the hair.

Then up and down the garden walks they would gambol, Nina and Tibs, and even the blades of grass and the flowers would bend together and whisper, "She loves her so. But one day Nina brought home a new kitten, a white little darling with blue eyes, like a child's.

She called her Snowball, and said was the dearest kitten in the world. Then Tibs tried not to be jealous, but sang her one song at her mistress's feet, while Snow-ball nested in her arms, "She loves me so; she loves me so," and all the evening after she sang it softly herself, among the sunset rave and nodding flowers in the garden-"She loves me so; she loves me so."

But from that day a tearful sound stole into her ditty—it was the same words, for, ob, how could she sing any other? though Snowball was always in her mistress's arms, her companion in hor countries. arms, her companion in her garden walks, while poor Tibs only gambolled behind, like a faithful snadow. One day her tender little heart could bear it no longer; and when Nina sat lond-ling Snowbail in her arms she humbly climbed up for a like caress.

"What an ngly little thing you have grown to be, Tibs!" she said, and put her down without a fond touch or loving kiss. Tibs thought she would faint, but no, instead, she stole away into the garden and sang her old ditty, to see if it would soothe her pain—"She loves me so." And even the butterflies paused in their flight to see who was singing such a sad-toned song. But ah! snesang a sadder yet. One morning Nina struck her, just for stealing up to taste Snowball's milk, which she was lapping from the very saucer she had used in the dear old days, gone for ever! Yes, struck her, and said, "You greedy little thing! I don't love you a bit!" Then Tibs felt her heart was breaking.

and from that day she sangher old song no more, but one which sounded like a secho—"She loved me so;" this is what she sang, and grew thin and spiritless, with rough fur, and weary, lagging teet.
"What a pining little creature she has grown to be! 'said one and another.

"Ah! if they had only known that her heart was breaking! If Nina had known! But no one knew, only the little birdies, and they twittered when they heard the wee thing's sad song:

Love lost may come again.

But it never did. Nina never took her old favorite to her heart again, never she ought: and one thought all the little stars were twinking in the sky, Tibs sat under a biossoming appletree in the orchard, the pink petals drifting about her like the beautiful something she had lost, song her ditty, "She loved me so," and died! They found her in the morning, a wee bundle of dirty fur; her face was beautiful still with her love, that was a.l.
Well, they buried her. Did Tibs know that Nina shed tears over her when her mamma said, "I fear, dear, you neglected poor Tibs for Snowbail?" Did she know the flowers she strewed over her before Thomas filled in her little grave? How could she when her tender heart was broken, when it could not throb with love or sorrow any more.

But Nina never turned off old friends for new ones again, and often sits near Tips' grave, and talks to Snowball of the kitten who loved her first, with a touch of regret she will always feel.

ROYALTY AND MUSIC.-The Emperor of Russia is a first-class cornet player. one accompanied Nilsson in one of her songs; and not long ago, when singing before him she sang the same air, much to the gratification of the Emperor.
The Queen of the Belgians is a devoted musician. The Emperor of Brazil maintains an Italian Opera out of his own purse, and he has one of the most complete operatic companies in the world.

The Emperor of Austria, also, spends more than a million france a year on the companies. Resaint used once to Vienna Opera house. Rossini used once to compose a trifling melody every year for the King of Portugal. Everybody knows what a passion the late King Louis of Bavaria had for music.

King Oscar of Sweden has a magnificent basso voice, and sings like an artist. Here are one or two interesting facts respecting the taste for music in the present sovereigns of Europe.

The Emperor of Germany, for matance, adores music, and never misses an oppor-tunity to hear Patti, or other celebrity. He always goes behind the scenes after the performance to thank the artiste.

Queen Victoria is also a great amateur of music, and sings very beautifully. She was a pupil of Lablache, and he used to say that if she were not Queen of Great Britain she might be a queen of song. The late Prince Consort's passion for music is well known. It was he who made Mendelssohn known in England and prc.

The Prince of Wales is also a good musician, and the Princess of Wales is one of Halles best pupils. The Duke of Edin-burgh, as we all know, could earn his liv-ing with the violin, if necessary.

THE DEVIL FESTIVAL—A Chinese paper, of Sept. 1st last, says: The Devil Festival is said to have originated in a legend of the mother of a fabulous person, Mu-lien; she was about the wickedest per-son then in existence, there being no being no crime which she left uncommitted.

After her death, she appeared one night to her son Mu-lien with a heavy wooden collar round her neck, and she harrowed his soul with the tale of her sufferings in the lower regions.

She said she was enduring the penalty for her unnumbered sins during her earthly life, and pleaded with her son to deliver her out of the hands of Pluto. This to him seemed an impossible task, as no human being can enter the dark regions and return alive. She told him that he must be come a Buddhist priest, and that there was a door in a certain Buddhist temple which he could open and so let out the prisoners from the shades below.

The son, being filial, obeyed the behest of his mother, and sought out a well-known Buddhist priest in a certain famous temple, and asked to be admitted as a

As his life was pure the priest willingly admitted him. After having been there several months, and learned all the Buddhist prayers, he sought out the door that led to the Lower Suades, whither the wicked ones had gone, and, remembering his mother's instruction, he knocked open the door. The judge Pluto being always willing to release his victims upon the intercession of saints, has set all his prisoners free for a certain length of each year, beginning on the 15th of the 7th moon, ever since the time when St. Mu-lien knocked open that

It has become customary for the people throughout the country, in the seventh moon of every year, to worship their ancesters, whose spirits are then at large. The annual Devil Festival held by the the annual Devil Festival field by the Cantonese and Fuhkienese began to-day by theatricals, &c., at their cemetery below Hsing Hua Chun. It will last three days and three nights.

The people from Canton and Fuhkien provinces are not few, and those whose remains are buried here are numerous. The mains are buried here are numerous. The amount of paper, clothes, money, &c., burned to the departed is consequently very great. The spectators of theatroal plays rush in from every part of the city. The streets are collivened by numerous passing mule-carts and jinrickshas.

BUTTERLY AND THE BEE. On a splendid autumn day, when all the flower-beds were ablaze with purple, and orange, and crimson, and gold, a modest brown bee and a gorgeous butterfly found themselves together on the same cluster of scarlet geranium.

"Dear me, how you do slave, neighbor!" said the butterfly. Here have you been working away ever so long on this one flower, whilst I have roved over a dozen beds in the same time. ple admire me, and run after me!"

"Yes; and sometimes catch you," said the bee; "and kill you." The butterfly was a little taken aback: but he was a jaunty fellow, and soon reovered himself,

"Well, I'm off!" he said. "You can stay and plod here all day on one stupid flower." il you choose. Give me constant change. that is very fine," But those who gad about so much seldom do anv good work. Besides, as you say. you only stop a moment on each flower whereas I never leave it till I have sucked all the honey out of it. So I work, and yet if y about all the same."

"Yes, yes!" answered the butterfly. "But all your toil only causes you to be killed for the sake of your honey. I die after an idle life, and you after a busy one. But we both die, so where is the dufer. But we both die, so where is the differ-

"We must all die," said the bee; "but there is this great difference. You die, and no one regrets or remembers you. But when I die, the work that I have done has not only maintained me during my he, but will benefit others after in

A. H. B.

THE HALO OF ROMANCE.

BY SUSANNA J.

O Life, how dull thy paths would be, How rugged and how lone, But for the halo of romance, Whose dreams, too sweet for utterance, For thy long dearth atone:

With me in reason's earliest dawn Romance her rule began; I owned her strange ideal power And sought her presence and her dower As only Childhood can,

O ve green woods of beechen shade, Whose paths I loved to tread, What words can tell the dreams that came, What light and gladness thrilled my frame, Through your calm vistas shed?

Heroic souls of whose brave deeds The world keeps record true, I saw them as in mortal guise, And read in their uplifted eyes The pow'r to will and do.

Ah, dreams, e'en to Life's darkest hours What glory ye can give! And of that strange ethereal light Earth is not yet divested quite, Nor will be while I live.

POPULAR TRADITIONS.

Small indeed was the medieval capacity for inventing wonders compared with that of the old world. The men of the Middle Ages only repeated what Pliny and Ælian, and such like had written down.

It is to Pliny that we owe all the stories about Druids, and mistletoe, and the golden sickle, and the white linen cloth; and he first tells the oft-repeated tale of the serpent's egg, a great medicine among those priests of the Britons. It is formed, he says, by the joint parturition of a whole group of serpents, and, so fondly do they cling to it, that he who would take it from them must provide a swift horse if he would escape their wrath.

The strangest thing is, that now and then Pliny gets into a critical mood. He believes, indeed, that a screech owl's feet, burned with the plant plumbago, are good against serpents; but he cannot stomach the assertion that if you lay a screech-owl's heart on the left breast of a woman asleep she will disclose all her inmost secrets, nor will be admit that screech-owls' eggs cure all hair defects, "for who," he asks, "ever found the nest, seeing the bird is so rare?"

The Romans always carefully expiated a portent, and if an owl was seen in the city a special purification feast had to be held immedia ely.

Naturally Pliny is great about the pygmies. He has been talking of the Troglodytes, of wonderful swiftness, swimming like fish in the Arabian Gulf; and then he

"The nation of the pretty pygmies lives in the marshes at the source of the Nile"where, by the way, diminutive tribes have actually been found by explorers-"and they enjoy a truce and cessation from arms every year, when the cranes, who use to wage war with them, be once departed, and come into our countries."

The cranes have cause for their enmity, seeing that the pygmies, mounted on goats and rams, and armed with arrows, come down to the sea, and for three months eat the cranes' eggs and young.

Ctesias, who wrote about Alexander's conquests, places these pygmies in India, and says they have hairy bodies, and go about wretched and morose because they are of such small size. Vespasian, we are told, put into the amphitheatre a number of cranes matched against dwarfs got up like

Pliny speaks of the cavalry of Sybaris dancing in time, and speaks of the human tore-feet of Casar's horse as if such horses were to be met with every hundred years or so. Of course, too, he tells all about "hippomanes," the tumor on the foal's forehead, which the mother bites off, going mad if anyone takes it away before she has done so, and, as it makes a very powerful love-potion, there is often somebody on the look-out to get hold of it.

What an enviable state of mind must that be in which one feels so sure that the lard of such a sharp sighted beast as the wolf, mixed with Attic honey, is a sovran for those whose sight is dim or troubled; that the owl comes out of its egg tail first; and that the cats, worshipped in Egypt, jumped in whenever they saw a house on fire, to the dire distress of the Egyptians, who pulled out their bodies and made mummies of them, shaving off their own eyebrows as a eign of mourning!

This story, by the way, comes not from Pliny, but from Herodotus, whose appetite for wonders was qualified by a suspicion-which every now and then he expresses-that those Egyptian priests were humbugging him.

But the cat, though it had lived in Egypt for ages, being used there as a retriever, overcoming its dislike of water in its zeal to recover the ducks its master had shot, was not in classic times domesticated in Greece or Rome.

The reason why the owl is always a-cold is because when the wren had got singed in bringing fire from heaven, all the other birds gave her each a feather; but the owl, which, from the thickness of its plumage, might have contributed at least a pair, totally refused to give any.

The ages of faith, then, were certainly not the ages of research. There were no museums, no Zoo. Everybody compiled from his predecessor, and of much that they tell us we must say, as the showman did of Buffon, "He tells a pack of lies."

And yet, when we think of all that has been written about the sea-serpent, we feel that the moderns have no right to laugh at the ancients on the score of credulity. The latest notion is that the "sea serpent" is a gigantic squid or calamary; but, if so, the eyes of those who sighted it must have played strange tricks with its shape.

But yet there does not seem any very good reason, after all, why the sea should not occasionally produce monstrous eels, which may have been magnified by observers, sometimes innocently enough, sometimes purposely, into the "great seaserpent" of popular tradition.

THERE are men in whom the resurrection begun makes the resurrection credible. In them the spirit of the risen Saviour works already; and they have mounted with Him from the grave. They have risen out of the darkness of doubt into the brightness and sunshine of a day in which God is ever light. Their step is as free as if the clay of the sepulchre nad been shaken off; their hearts are lighter than those of other men, and there is in them an unearthly triumph they are unable to express. They have risen above the narrowness of life, and all that is petty, ungenerous, and mean. They have risen above tear, above self. This is the spiritual resurrection, or being risen with Christ; and the man in whom that is working has something more blessed than external evidence to rest upon.

Grains of Gold.

Unreasonable haste is the direct road to

It is of no use running; to set out betimes s the main point.

The order of our needs should be the orer of our deeds. He who has no wish to be happier, is the

Doing good is the only certainly happy

Knowledge of our duties is the most use-

Good thoughts are no better than good

freams unless they are executed

Learn in manhood to unlearn the follies

He who knows right principles is not qual to him who loves ther

Unless the habit leads to happiness, the est habit is to contract none.

Holiness, indeed, implies morality, but norality does not imply holiness.

Hatred is nearly always honest-rarely f ever assumed. So much cannot be said for love

It is with charity as with money-the ore we stand in need of it, the less we have to give Whatever things injure your eye you are anxious to remove; but things which affect your mind you defer.

To feel much for others and little for ourselves; to restrain our selfish, and to indulge our hencevolent affections, constitute the perfection of buman nature.

He that does good to another does good also to himself, not only in the consequence, but in the very act; for the consciousness of well-doing, is in itself sufficient reward.

Procrastination has been called a theifhe thief of time, I wish it were no worse than a hief. It is a murderer; and that which it kills is not ime merely, but the immortal soul.

They are two parallels, never but asun der: charity feeds the poor, so does pride; charity builds a hispital, so does pride. In this they differ sarity gives her glory to God; pride takes her glory

Femininities.

Woman is woman's worst traducer.

There is none so homely but loves a look. ng-glass.

Edgefield, Tenn., has a belle named adv Love.

Woman's inhumanity to man makes

A mandolin orchestra is a Western form animating an afternoon tea.

A milliner of this city stamped upon her ill-heads a picture of the forget-m Christian patience is something more han a thought, or an emotion, or a tear; it is action. In the matter of speed there is a great similarity between a flash of lightning and a bit of Actors seldom go to church, but the ministers really ought not to complain. They seldom go to the theatre.

Four young women have been suspended from a public school at Carthage, Ill., beause they attended a ball.

Guide: "A very rich Englishman fell at this place last year." Alpine tourist: "Well, it recessary, I can afford it, too."

When a London lady urges a friend: "Do take off your skin!" she merely means for her to lay aside her sealskin cloak.

The Venetian blind, familiar to our fathrs and still to be seen in Philadelphia, is being taken into tashionable favor again.

An unfortunate Maine baby that hap pened to be born on the day of her grandparents golden wedding, was named Anna Versary.

Secrets are but poor property; if you circulate them, you lose them, and if you keep them, you lose the interest on your investment. Miss Thankful Stanton, aged 99 years, has been left forlorn by the death, near Clinton, N. Y., of her sister, Mrs. Anna Parmlee, aged 104 vears. From Hot Springs, Ark., it is reported that at a ball there lately, a younglady, her mother, grandmother and greatgrandmother danced in the

A Kansas widow rode six miles during a recent cold snap to put a mortgage on her place, and the first thing she bought was a celluloid toile set in a plush case.

A pessimist walking with his wife, and necting a large school of girls, exclaimed suddenly "Heavens and earth—the poor men! What a crowd of future mothers-in-law!"

An orchestra made up of young society women, who have come together solely for recres tion and musical study, now numbers among the organizations of Pittsburg.

A little bag of mustar l laid on the top of the pickle-jar will prevent the vinegar from be-coming moldy if the pickles have been put up in vinegar that has not been boiled.

He: "What will you have dear, candy or ice cream?" She: "No, Frank, get me some pon-corn, please." He: "Do you like that stuff?" She: "Yes: I like crerything that pops." Middle-aged lady, to the object of her adoration: "Now be sure and destroy my letters, "Certainly, my dear; no one could be more prodent. I even burn them before I read them." A young girl at Keokuk, Ia., fell on a bridge, and being unable to rise immediately her tongue froze to the fron railway and remained in that condition until she was released by a passer-

The two most precious things on this side the grave are our reputation and our life. But it is to be lamented that the most contemptible whis per may deprive us of the one, and the weakest weapon of the other.

She, to Harry, who is taking her out for a rice and whose horse has balked: "Don't be annoyed, flarry; have pattence and he will move on presently." He: "Patience, my dear! Why I'm paying for this wretched animal by the hour."

Wife, on her husband's return from his office: "I came across a lot of your old love-letters to-day, dear, in one of the trunks up-states. All John, how you did love me!" Husband: "Yes, hidded. Say, is dinner ready? I'm as hungry as a

A lady applied to her physician for a remedy for loss of appetite. He wrote the follow-ing: "Stop at the first shoe store you come to, buy ots, and wear them all out in threcary for drugs.

A drummer who kissed a country girl remarked, ecstatically; "How charming it is press the lips of innocence for the first time;" you city fellers must have gone to the same scho Every mother's son of you says the same thing when e kisses me!" she repited.

Dressmaker, to bereaved widow: "How long would you like the mearning veil to be, ma dame?" Bereaved widow, with a burst of grief "I don't care for expense at a time like this, mi-husband's death was a dreadful how. Make the veil as long as the style will warrant."

"Papa," said a beautiful girl, "I found several clears scattered about the front yard this morning. Did you drop them?" "No, they don't belong to me," responded the old man. "Shortly morning. Did you aren them? "So, they don't belong to me," responded the old man. "Shortly after young sampson left you last night I thought I eard a noise outside, and I shouldn't be surprise I Nero had been shaking him for the clears. Ev

Masculinities.

When weariness comes take a breathing

Time spent in making home happy is ever thrown away.

Every man should have a hobby and ride t, but not let it ride him

It you want to have a man for a friend ever get the ill-will of his wife.

Which is the worse, the man you can ing and won't, or the man who can't and will? The parson tells you that you should marry for love, and yet he generally marries for

A shabby coat is no disgrace, but it is a great impediment to the successful negotiation of a

A man's nature, runs either to herbs or weeds; therefore he should reasonably water the one and destroy the other.

The Duke of Newcastle is the youngest duke in England. Hall of his 21 years of life have been spent in ill health.

There is so much electricity in a kiss that ngaged lovers have been known to depend upon it altogether to light a spacious room. The united ages of a bridal couple were 177 years. They were married without the consent of their parents. How wrong of them! A Western man has offered $1000 for the apture of the devil. The fact seems to be creating ousiderable consternation in New York. It a man has a right to be proud of any. thing, it is of a good action done as it ought to be, without any base interest lurking at the bottom of

Hannah More said to Horace Walpole: "If I wanted to punish an enemy, it should be by fastening on him the trouble of constantly hating somebody."

An Ypsilanti, Mich., man has a queer craze, that of collecting axes. He has 92 different kinds, and yet his wife complains of scarcity of kindling wood. A country paper says in an obituary notice, "Mr. X was an estimable citizen. He lived uprightly; he died with perfect resignation. He had been recently married,"

The man that faces a ten year sentence to State Prison for the sake of "putting on style" for two or three years may be an excellent bookkeeper, but a very poor philosopher. "What do you think? I have a girl who gets up in the morning without being called," Chorus of voices: "Impossible," "But it is true; the is in love with the milkman." Any system of instruction which does not teach a lad to think falls very lar short of the best results of education, and leaves him without the most vital element of success.

Make a point never so clear, it is great odds that a man whose habits and the bent of whose mind lie a contrary way will be unable to comprehend it-so weak a thing is reason in competition In Liverpool a play entitled "Who's the

Lunatic?" was recently enacted. Before it was finished half the people in the audience were shouting: "The author, the author." When he blushingly appeared he was greeted with roars of laughter and cries of 'He's the lunatie;' Lady purchaser: "Now, please do not ask me, after I have bought what I want, If there's anything clse, If I want anything else, I can remember to ask for it without being reminded that there is something erse that I may want. Do you onerstand, Salesman Yes'm, Anythlugelse Recently the pall-bearers at a funeral at Chippewa Falls, Wis., were surprised to find that the open grave had an occupant. A tramp who had been employed to dig the grave, after solating himself with whisky, concluded that it was the warmest place to await the funeral, land down and went to

At the club. "Leap year is a great At the cuto. Deep year is a great season, lsn't it?' remarked Snobklos. "Just why?' queried Smith. "A girl proposed to me last hight." "No, you don't say?' "Yes, and I accepted," "Worse and more of it. How did it happen?" "Simplest thing in the world, the proposed to me to leave the house or she would call her father, and I left. That was all."

Society Belle-"Mother, Mr. DeBrass has proposed and I have accepted. Mother-"What? Oh, you wicked, ungrateful girl, after all we've done for you. Mr. DeBrass hasn't a cent to bless himself with, and won't have until his f and grandfather die, 't "The Mr. DeBrass I at until his father erring to is the grandfather."

Wife-"What is meant, Johnny, by the phrase "carrying coals to Newcastler". Husband "It is a metaphor, my dear, showing the doing of something that is necessary." Wife-"I don't exactly understand. Give me an illustration, a smillar one." Husband - Well, it I was to bring you home a book entitled "How to Talk," that would be 'carrying coals to Newcastle,

At Athens, Ga, the other evening, great preparations were made for a wedding among the colored folks. The bride was prepared in gorgeons raiment; the table grouned with good things. the groom came not. He sent word that he not be present. Another young manufered to his place, but the tribe objected. Then all t and all enjoyed themselves as though there was really a wedding.

Young man, you had better not try to * A student at a New Jersey military in stitues, whose home is in tutas, was deeply intercated by the first snow-storm this winter. He spent considerable time outdoors, rolled six snowballs and placed them in his truak, intending to take them home with him next-vacation. When he found a pool of water in his truak he mournfully exclaiment:

"My feather balls are all gone."

Young man, you had better not try to filt with a pair of hazeleyes. It is a waste of time and dangeroos, there are less annequine man they and dangeroos. There are less annequine man the grief, but raily for reverge and last it must be sound. If you fackle them you had better not try to filter with a pair of hazeleyes. It is a waste of time and dangeroos. There are less annequine man the grief, but raily for reverge and last it must be sound. If you fackle them you had better not try to filt with a pair of hazeleyes. It is a waste of time and dangeroos. There are less annequine man the grief, but raily for reverge and last it must be sound. If you fackle them you had better not try to filt with a pair of hazeleyes. It is a waste of time and dangeroos. There are less annequine in an the grief, but raily for reverge and last it must be sound. If you fackle them you had better not try to filt with a pair of hazeleyes. It is a waste of time and dangeroos. There are less annequine in an the grief, but raily for reverge and last it must be sound. If you fackle them you had better not try to filter with a pair of hazeleyes. It is a waste of time and dangeroos. There are less annequine in the same and dangeroos. There are less annequine in the same and dangeroos. There are less annequine in the same and dangeroos. There are less annequine in the same and dangeroos. There are less annequine in the same and dangeroos. There are less annequine in the same and dangeroos. There are less annequine in the same and dangeroos. The same and dangeroos are less annequine in the same and dangeroos. The same anneauter reveal and there are less anneauters and the sam

Recent Book Issues.

The Story of Jewad," translated from the Turkish of Ali Aziz Etendi, by E. J. W. Gibb, M. R. A. S., affords a curious and interesting insight into the occult sciand their practitioners in Turkey, ences and their practitioners in Intracy, conveyed through the agency of fiction. The story reads like a chapter from "The Thousand and One Nights," and gives an admirable picture of Turkish life and manner. The story is remarkably entertaining, and in the moral it teaches exceedtaining, and in the moral it teaches exceeding y attractive. There is always a pecu-liar charm in Eastern fiction, and it will be found in its strongest development in this ingenious and poetic tale. Published by W. Gottsberger, New York. For sale by Porter & Coates.

PRESH PERIODICALS.

The March number of The Quiver opens with a paper entitled "A New Mission Field," Much profitable reading may be found in "How to Sanctify Marriage, the Rev. Gordon Calthrop. Edward Gar-rett continues his papers on "The Sait of the Earth," in which he gives sympathetic sketches of some noble lives. Other artic-les are "The Transfigurations," "Clearing the Corners," "Some Remarkable Church Towers," "Promises for the Sorrowing." Towers. Promises for the S rrowing, Visit to Some Aged Pilgrim o," "A Sound-Minded Religion," sides serids, short stories, poetry, with plenty of good illustrations. $1. year. Cassell & Co., publishers, York.

The thing that will strike the American The thing that will strike the American reader the first in the Magazine of Art. for March, is a short paper called "Some Plain Words on American Taste in Art." The other articles are a carefully prepared paper on "current art," profusely illustrated. The studies in English costumes are continued. There is a capital paper on trated. The studies in English costume are continued. There is a capital paper on "The Progress of English Art." There is one about Irish types. The most important paper of the number is the one on Auguste Rodin, by Claude Phillips. Rodin is the most-talked-of sculptor in France to-day, and the productions of his works given in this magazine show him to be a sculptor of manufacture. unusual vigor and decided originality. The frontispiece of the number is a photogravure from James Bertrand's "Virginia," which portrays the dead body of Bernar din de St. l'ierre's heroine washed up by the tide. And there is a page engraving after one of Parsons' landscapes. Altoatter one of Parsons' landscapes. Alto-gether this March number is a good one. year. Cassell & Co., publishers, New York.

Cassell's Family Magazine for March opens with an installment of that spirited serial "Monica," or "Strongerthan Death," which bids fair to outdistance some of its predecessors in popularity. "Some Cats of a Larger Growth" is a lively paper on tigger by one who has lived tigers, by one who has lived among them in their jungles. The devoted sister who nur-ed her brother back to health through a case of typhoid fever, gives the conclu-sen of her experiences, which ought to be produable reading to amateur nurses. The interesting "City of Shereefs" is described. The "Family Doctor" tells what he thinks of so-called tonics, "My Cookery Class and what I Taught It" is a thoroughly and what I Taught It" is a thoroughly practical paper, and so is "A Family of Boys and how they were Started in Life." The two fashion letters are filled with their usual amount of early information from London and Paris. "The Gatherer" is unusually full, and among the novelties it reports is an "Electric Table Waiter." $1.50 a year. Cassell & Co., publishers, Lappincott's Magazine for March opens Lappincott's Magazine for March opens with a complete novel by Julia Magruder, "Honored in the Breach," which is full of a quiet, subdued interest with pleasant taches of humor and patnes. A remarkably clever article by Max O'Reli is entitled by Max O'Reli is entitled. ably clever article by Max O'Reli is enti-tied "From My Letter B.x." and presents a summary of the contents of anonymous and other letters received by the author of "John Bull and His Island" with humorous comments, "A Talk with a President's Son," the son being General John Tyler, now living in Washington, by Frank G. Carpenter, is full of historical interest in regard to the inner workings of the Tyler Albion W. Tourges's "With Gauge & Swadow" is sub-titled "A Retainer in Cupid's Court,' and turns upon an interestthere are points by Charles Henry Phelps, Charlotte Fiske Bates, W. H. Hayne, and Harris n. S. Morris. The "One Hundred Prize Questions" are continued by a fresh instalment of twenty, and much curious and interesting information is conveyed in the editorial departments. Published by Lippincott & Co.

EARNEST—EISTENER: "Now, Miss Brown, won't you play something for us?" Miss B: "No, thank you; I'd rather hear Mr Jones," E. L.: "So would I, but—" Here he was stopped by the expression on the young lady's lace; and he looked confused for half an hour after she had indigentally thened and left him. nautly turned and left him.

GENUINE cheerfulness is an almost certain index of an honest heart. Dyspepsia and genuine cheerfulness never go hand in hand, but Warner's Log Cabin Hops and Buchu Remedy will ensure you good digestion, the certain index of genuine cheerfulness and the honest heart.

WARNER'S Log Cabin Sarsaparilla Regulates the Regulator. Best blood purifier, Largest bottle in the market, Manufac-tured by the proprietors Warner's Safe Cure. Sold by all druggists.

WHEAT RAISING IN CHINA.

In the northern and middle parts of In the northern and middle parts of China, wheat raising is one of the principal industries of the farmers. The winter wheat is planted about the same time that wheat is planted here.

The soil, particularly in the northern provinces, is so well worn that it is especially unfitted for wheat growing, and the Chinese farmers, appreciating this fact, and also that all kinds of fertilizers are excessively dear, make the least manure do the nost good by mixing the seedlings with finely prepared manure. A man with a bushel basket swung upon his shoulders follows the plow, and plants the mixture in large hand-uis in the forrows, so that when crop grows up in the fall it looks like young celery.

Immediately after the first melting of snow, and when the ground has become sufficiently hardened by frost, these wheat fields are turned into pastures, under the theory that, by a timely clipping of the tops of these plants by healthy animals, the crops will grow up in the spring with additional strength.

Wheat thrashing is the principal interest Wheat thrashing is the principal interest in Chinese tarming. Owing to the scarcity of fuel, the wheat is piled up in sheaves, the same as is done here, and immediately carted to the "mien chong," a smoothed and hardened space of ground near the home of the farmer. The tops of the sheaves are then clipped off by a hand machine. The wheat is thus left in the "mien chong." The wheat is thus left in the "mien chong." to dry, while the headless sheaves are piled up in a heap on the outside of the "mien chong" for fuel or thatching.

When the wheat is thoroughly dry it is beaten under a great stone roller pulled by horses, while the places thus rolled over are constantly tossed about with pitch-The stalks left untouched by the roller are thoroughly thrasned with flails by women and toys.

The well beaten stalks and straws are then taken out by an ingenious manip plation of the pitchforks, and the chaff is removed by a systematic tossing of the golden grain into the air in snovelfuls until the wind has blown every vertical of the form. wind has blown every particle of chaff or Even the chaff is carefully swept up and stowed away for fuel or other useful purposes, such as stuffing mattresses, pillows, and for stable uses. After the wheat has been allowed to dry a few hours in the burning sun, it is stowed away in airy bam

Wheat, in ordinary years, is worth in open market in northern China, about $1 per American bushel. The milling process is a very ancient one—two round, large bluestone wheels with grooves neatly cut in the face on one side, and in the centre of the lower a large wooden peg, are used: The process of making flour out of wheat by this slow machinery is called 'moh mien." Usually a horse or mule is em-ployed. The poor, having no animals, grind the grain themselves.

Three distinct grades of flour are thus produced by this single grain. The "shon mien," or A grade, is the first siftings; the "nee mien," or second grade, is the grind-ings of the rough leavings from the first siftings, which is of a darker and redder color than the first grade; the last grade, or 'mo D," is the finely ground last siftings of the other grades.

When bread is made from this last grade it resembles rough gingerbread. This is usually the food of the poorest families, who buy it at something like 20 cents a burches. bushel.

The bread of the Chinese is usually fermented and then steamed. Only a very small quantity is baked in ovens. But the stable articles of food in northern China are corn, millet, and sweet potatoes. Wheat and rice are the food of the rich. In the southern provinces the entire breadstuff is

A USEFUL TREE .- There is no tree that is so sure to grow without any care as the willow. A twig from a branch of the tree willow. stuck into the moist earth, and the labor is completed. An article in a German contemp rary recommends the cultivation of willow trees not only from an economical and industrial point of view, but also tor hygienic purposes. They are especially useful where the drinking water is taken from fountains or natural wells, and still more where there are morasses and meadows; for in the vicinity of willow-trees water is always clear and pure. Let those whe doubt this fact place a piece of willow which has not yet begun to strike, into a bottle of water, and place this within another bottle containing water only, in a warm room for eight days; in the first bottle will be found shoots and rootlets in clear water, while the other bottle will contain putrefying wat r. Holland is covered with willows, and their dam works are strength-Holland is covered with wilened by the network formed by the roots

"PAPA, do not drink to-night!" The words came in soft, pleading, tear-soaked tones, from the sweet, golden-haired innocent that grasped his hand beseechingly. A tear came into the father's eye. "Why not, my child?" he asked. "Because Alphonso will be here to night; and if you come home blind, blazing, staggering drunk, smash-ing everything, you're going to scare him off, and plumbers' sons are not plentiful this season. That's the why."

THE less we deserve good fortune, the more we hope for it.

"Stop thief." Reader, don't steal one, but buy a bottle of Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup. 25c Rub the Salvation Oil in and you will rub the pain out. Get only the genuine. 25 cts.

STONE EATERS.—An old book, the "Artifical Changeling," published about the middle of the seventeenth century, makes mention of an extraordinary individual, Francis Battalia, who was credited with making his meals on stones, of which he would eat half a peck a day.

After a wonderful account, more or less appropriately of Retails a hit theod.

apocryphal, of Battalia's childhood, such as one hand and ore stone in the other, and his having refused from the first all food with the exception of stones, the author goes on to speak of his appearance and peculiarities at the time he saw him, when he was thirty years of age.

"His manner," he says, "is to put three or lour stones into a spoon, and so putting them into his mouth together he swallows them all down; then (first spitting) he drinks a glass of beer after them. He deevery day, and when he chinks upon his stomach, or shakes his body, you may hear the stones rattle as if they were in a sack, all which in twenty-four hours are dissolved. He has attempted to eat bread and meat, br th and milk; but he could never brook any; neither would they stay with him to do him any good.'

He spent some time as a soldier and sold his rations regularly.

Battalia has not the distinction of being the only stone, eater known. Platerus mentions one who for a copper or two would swallow any stones given him. would swallow any stones given him, "though they were as big as walnuts." Father Paulian also speaks of a stone eater who was found on Good Friday, in 1757, in a northern inhabited island (not specified by name), by the crew of a Dutch ship, and conveyed to Avignon. He swallowed flints an inch and a half long, a full inch broad, and half an inch thick, and such stones as he could reduce to powder, such as marble, peoples, etc., he made up into paste, which he are with more gusto than n alderman eats turtle.

He was a veritable wild man of the woods. He was inordinately fond of brandy tolerated wine, but would not touch bread and his keeper had the greatest difficulty in making him eat raw flesh with his stones. He slept at least twelve hours a day, sitting invariably on the ground with one kneed over the other. He smoked all the time he was not asleep or eating.

HOW A TRAGEDY WAS AVOIDED .- "YOU had a row with Grigsty to-day, I under-stand?" "Not much of a row, tortunately." "How did it occur?" "Why, he called me a horse thief, a swindler and numerous other disagreeable names." "What did you say?" "I told him that for two cents I would whip him." "Did he give you the money!" "No, he had nothing but a two-cent stamp and I never take stamps."

MAGISTRATE—"Had you ever saw this man before?" Witness—"Yes," "Had he came before you had wen:?" "No." "Is them your eggs what you say was stole?" "Yes." "Would you have recognised them if you had seen them before they were brung here?" "Yes; I would have knowed them." "Speak grammatic, young man; them." "Speak grammatic, young man; it sin't proper to say 'have knewed;' you should say, 'have knew.'

Four prisoners who escaped from a Georgia jail successfully exerted their powers of persuasion over two bloodhounds that had been despatched in pursuit, and after tying them together, added another to their list of theits by carrying them off.

WANAMAKER'S.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 20, 1888.

DRESS GOODS HERE AND COMING, COMING. They are tunneling over each other, crowding, jostling to get where you can see and handle them. The Sateens and Ginghams, and the wilderness of other cotten stuffs and their royal relations, the India and China Sitis, were never prettler or better. Often to the eye as if the flowers of May were peeping through the snows of January. Buds and blossoms and promise of sweets enough to almost set the bees honey-hunting. A chorus of color greets you as the stuff of the rainbow, "cloud wreathed and posy decked the rainbow, "cloud wreathed and posy decked. The plain shades of silk, of wood, and of silk-andwood mixtures are welcome by way of central, the choustand and fifty-nine styles of Sateena. Shimmery, sheeny fluciess and marvels of weave and orbiting. Peerless, 12 sec. fine French, 3ic, best iondred and eighteen Styles Glughams. Best an, 20c.; Anderson's, 40c.; Scotch Zephyr,

Plain Woolens, hundreds of styles in all the popular shades.

Fight Woodens, fundamental art silvers.

Serges 50c, to §1.25.

Disconsis 50c to §1.25.

Billowy, white capped Challis, 50 and 60c.

Soft, creamy Cashmeres 50c, to §1.25.

Wood Plands, full of noveltles, 75c, to §1.25.

Noveity Stripes and Plain Stripes, 50c, to §3.50.

And so on through the haif-royal Silk Warps, the exquisite Habit Cloths and Broadcloths, the soft, hair sprinkled Camel's-barr, and the Sturdy Shirtings of Percales (2.2c). Mountain ranges of Flannels and Secretackers and Muslins.

There is not such another gathering of Dress Stuffs between the oceans. Every sort is seeable, get-at-able. And the prices as proper as the stuffs,

JOHN WANAMAKER.
PHILADELPHIA.

THE INVALUABLE DOMESTIC REMEDTL

PHENOL SODIQUE. Proprietors, HANCE BROTHERS & WHITE, Philad's.

EXTERNALLY—for sli kinds of injuries; relieving pain instantly, and rapidly healing the wounded parts.

Gives prompt and permanent relief in BURNS, SCALDS CHILBLAINS, VENOMOUS STINGS, or BITES, CUTS and WOUNDS of every description. INTERNALLY—It is invaluable in CHOLERA, VELLOW, TYPHUS, TYPHOID, SCARLET, and other Fevers.

TELIAW, TYPHUS, TYPHOID, SCARLET, and ther Fevers.

In NASAL CATARRH, Facial Discharges from the EAR, OZANA, Affections of the ANTRUM, and CANCEROUS AFFECTIONS, it is a boon to both Physician and Patient.

For SICK-ROGMS, and all IMPURE and UNHEALTHY LOCALITIES, and to prevent the spread of CONTAGION, it is the best DISINFECTANT known.

For Sale by Druggists and General Merchandise Dealers

In from one to twenty minutes never fails to relieve PAIN with one thorough application. how violent or excruciating the pain, the Rheumatic, now visient or extractating the pain, the intenmatic, Bedridden, Infirm, Crippled, Nervous, Neuralgic, or prostrated with disease may suffer, Radway's Ready Relief will afford instant ease. It instantly

Rheumatism, Coughs, Cold in the Head, Asthma, Pneumonia, Headache, Toothuche, Neuralgia, Colds, a Sore Throat, Bronchitis, Scintica. Inflammations. Congestion.

Ntrong Testimony from Honorable George Starr as to the Power of Radway's Rendy Relief in a Case of Sciatic Rheumatism.

No. 3 Van Ness Place, New York.

Dr. Radway: With me your Relief has worked wonders. For the last three years I have had frequent and severe attacks of scialca, sometimes extending from the lumbar regions to my ankles, and, at times, in both lower limbs.

During the time I have been afflicted 1 have tried almost all the remedies recommended by wise men and fools, hoping to find relief, but all proved to be failures.

almost at the remember of the fallers.

I have tried various kinds of baths, manipulations, outwarf aprilections of liniments too numerous to mention, and prescriptions of the most eminent physicians, all of which falled to give me relief.

Last September, at the urgent request of a friend (who had been afflicted as myself), I was induced to try your remedy. I was then suffering fearfully with one of my old turns. To my surprise and delight the first application gave me eace, after bathing and rubbing the parts affected, leaving the limb in a warm glow, created by the Keller. In a short time the pain passed entirely away, although I have slight periodical attacks approxening a change of weather. I know now how to cure myself, and feel quite master of the situation. RADWAY'S READY RELIEF is my friend. I never travel without a bottle in my valise. Yours truly,

Radway's Ready Relief is a Cure for Every Pain, Sprains, Bruises, Pains in the Back, Chest or Limbs, it was the First and is the Only PAIN REMEDY that instantly stops the most excruciating pains, allows inflammation, and cures Congestions, whether lays inflammation, and cures Congestions, whether of the Lungs, Stomach, Bowels or other glands or organs.

INTERNALLY, a half to a teaspoonful in half a tumbler of water will, in a few infinites, cure Cramps, Spasins, Sour Stomach, Nausea, Vointing, Heartburn, Nervousness, Sleeplessness, Siek Headache, Diarrhoza, Colic, Flatulency and all internal pains.

Malaria in Its Various Forms Cured and Prevented. There is not a remedial agent in the world that will cure Fever and Ague, and all other Malarious, Bilious and other fevers, aided by RADWAY'S PILLS, so quickly as RADWAY'S READY RELIEF.

R. R. R. not only cures the patient scient with Malaria, but if people exposed to the Malarial poisson will every morning take 20 or 8 drops of Ready Renef in the water, and eat, say a cracker, before going out, they will result that the second of RADWAY'S READY RELIEF with them. A sew drops in water will prevent sickness or pains from change in the patient of the relief than French Brandy or Bitteer than French Brandy or Bitteer in water will prevent sickness or pains from change of water. It is better than French Brandy or Bitters as a stimulant.

Fifty cents per bottle. Sold by druggists.

DR. RADWAY'S SARSAPARILLIAN RESOLVENT,

The Great Blood Purifier

For the cure of all chronic diseases, Chronic rheumatism, scrofulous complaints, etc., glandular swelling, backing dry cough, cancerous affections, bleeding of the lungs, dyspepsia, water basis, white swellings, tumors, ulcers, hip disease, goot, dropsy, rickets, sait rheum, bronchitis, consumption, liver complaints, etc.

HEALTH! BEAUTY!

Pure blood makes sound flesh, strong bone and a your bones sound, and your complexion fair, use RADWAY'S SARSAPARILLIAN RESOLVENT. The wonderful curves effected by the Sarsapacitism Resolvent; its powers over the kidneys in establish-The wonderful cures effected by the Sarsaparlillan Resolvent; its powers over the kidneys in establishing a healthy secretion of urine, carring dialoctes, inflammation or irritation of the bladder, allounthousor brick dust deposits or white saud, etc., establishing its character as A GREAT CONSTITUTIONAL REMEDY.

Sold by all druggists. One Dollar a bottle,

RADWAY'S PILLS,

The Creat Liver and Stomach Remedy,

For the cure of all disorders of the Stomach, Liver, Bowels, Kidneys, Bladder, Nervous Diseases, Loss of Appetite, Headache, Costiveness, Indigestion, Biliousness, Fever, Inflammation of the Bowels, Piles, and all derangements of the Internal Viscera. Purely vegetable, containing no mercury minerals, or deleterious drugs.

ERFECT DICESTION

Will be accomplished by taking one of Radway's Pills every morning about ten o'clock, as a dinner pill. By so doing

SICK HEADACHE

Dyspepsia, Foul Stomach, Billousness will be avoided, and the food that is eaten contribute its nourishing properties for the support of the natural waste of the body.

A few doses of RADWAY'S FILLS will free the system of all the above and all druggists.

PRICE, 25 cents Per Box. Sold by all druggists.

Send a letter stamp to RADWAY & CO., No. 2 Warren street, New York, Information worth thousands will be sent you

BY CHANCE.

They met by chauce; a wayward Fate Till then had kept them wide apart. He had no thought of love or hate; She aardly knew she had a heart.

They met by chance. The sinking sun Cast lengthening shadows on the ground; The long June day was nearly done;
The twilight dim was gathering round,

They met by chance; a fateful chance,
That brought them nearer—nearer still.
Each gave the other a startled glance; Each feit a momentary thrill.

They met by chance. A swift, sharp pain Unnerves them when they think of that. They trust they'll never meet again— The 'cyclist and the brindle cat!

Romantic death-A young lady drowned

Unprecedented trade announcement:-"The pig market was quiet." A comb is somewhat like a man, be cause in its old age it loses its teeth and hair, A little girl describes a snake as "a thing that's a tall all the way up to its head." Poker is one of the few games where the less a fellow knows about the game the better his

Why is a jack-o-lantern like a watch ket?-Because there is a bin both. (This answer will fit any conundrum.)

Overheard at the circus. Old lady, before the hyena's cage: "Mariar! Mariar! do look here! a real live hygeia!"

Wife: "That man has been staring at me for 5 minutes." Husband: "Well, you wouldn't have known it if you hadn't kept your eyes on

"I 'clar', Mr. Shockum, 'f I didn't forgit to ax you to take off yo' hat! I'm axshaily git-tin' dat absen'-minded I hain't got common perlite-

"He: "I declare, Miss Angeline, you treat me worse than your dog!" She: "Oh, Mr. de Moygyns, how can you say so? I'm sure I never made the slightest difference between you!"

She, speaking of the responsibilities of matrimony: "Would you be afraid to marry on a thousand a year, Tom?" He: "Not a bit, if I could only find a girl with an income of that amount." Doctor: "Who had been called to see a patient: "Do you wish to hear the truth?" Patient. "Certainly." D.: "You're not afraid to die?" P.: "Pshaw! Why, man, I've been married 26

"Jury," said a Western judge, "you kin go out and find a verdict. If you can't find one of your own, get the one the last jury used." The jury returned a verdict of "Suicide in the ninth degree."

"And do you really love me, George?" she asked. "Love you!" repeated George, fervently. "Why, while I was bidding you good-bye on the porch last night, dear, the dog bit a large piece out of the calf of my leg, and I never noticed it until I got home. Love you!"

"Do you know," remarked the profes sor, 'that dogs have been known to act strangely for several hours before an earthquake?'' 'f do,'' calmiy answered the student. "And what do you infer from this fact?" continued the professor. "That they were strange dogs," replied the brave

"Charley is coming to see me to-night," remarked Ella. "I don't know why I feel so nervous about it; but I have a presentiment that something is going to happen." "th, there's no use feeling nervous about it if you've made up your mind to do lt," answered Clara; "very likely he'll say yes; he was always soft."

"When you call on sister Clara, Mr. Featherly, 'said Bobby, 'you never stay later than 12 o'clock, do you?' 'No, Indeed, Bobby, and often not as late as that.' 'That's what pa said. He told ma that there was no danger of your ever staying any later than a quarter to 12 on Saturday nights, because the saloons close up at 12.

He was leaning against the lamppost and watchful policeman came up very respectfully "Fine night, Mr. Jones." "Bootful." "You're out rather late, ain't 'you?" "No, no-about my ushual time." "Are you waiting for somebody?" "No, no-goin' home. Little tired, shat's all." "I'll waik down with you and see you to your door." "Shank you, shanks; but shere's no need. Sh'other shide of the street will be aroun' shis way in a moment, an' I'll nop in when my door comes. in a moment, an' I'll pop in when my door comes

The young man had been trying to tell her how madly he loved her for over are hour, but couldn't pluck up the courage. "Excuse me a moment, Mr. Timid," she said, "I think I hear a ring at the telephone." And in her queenly way she swept into an adjoining room. Presently she returned, and then his mad passion found a voice. "I am sorry, Mr. F.," she said, "to cause you pain, but I am aiready engaged. Mr. Sampson, learning that you were here here oned by said through the court in the course. that you were here, has urged his suit through the mention. Bought singly, or a few patterns at a time, at usual prices, to mention. Bought singly, or a few patterns at a time, at usual prices, to the single single aime is known favorably at the world as standing at the best. Both the best writers are yound, in the world as standing at the best. Both pressure appendictly flustrated by the best artists. We will take 20,000 trial year subscribers at a price which gives us but a both pressure appendictly flustrated by the best artists. We will take 20,000 trial year subscribers at a price which gives us but a moderate portion of the coat.

$230 A MONTE Agents Wanted, 90 best selling articles in the world. I sample Free Address JAY BRONSON, Detroit, Mich.

SIO BEAL: FREE!

FREE I furthermore, every trial year subscriber, for either of the papers will receive free by mail our new acriptions will be received for either of the papers as follows: I subscription and I outfit, $30 cents; $20 subscriptions and $20 outfits, if sent at one time, $50 cents; $20 subscriptions and $20 outfits, if sent at one time, $50 cents; $20 subscriptions and $20 outfits, if sent at one time, $50 cents; $20 subscriptions and $40 outfits, if sent at one time, $50 cents; $20 subscriptions and $40 outfits, if sent at one time, $51 cents; $20 subscriptions and $40 outfits, if sent at one time, $51 cents; $20 subscriptions and they will thank you; papers will be mailed regularly to their separate addresses. While trial years subscriptions served for much lease thank count, it proves the subscriptions served for much lease thank count, it proves the subscriptions are large provened as welling to pay the regular price of 75 cents a year; through this, as time roils on, we respa profit that satisfies us. FREE I the trial year subscriptions are almost free, and this the Regula Queen. We read that the provent of $20 subscriptions are almost free, and this the Regula Queen. Selve we will so fa few of the patterns, space is too valuable to admit of asming all: I Popples for Scarf. 1-2 inch; $2 Tidy design, 7-1-2 inch; $3 splendid Tinsel design, $6 inch; $4 outfals of the first subscriptions and that the Ferns; 12 inch, $3 splendid Tinsel design, $6 inch; $6 outfals and $2 subscription and that the Provential Provential Provential $2 subscription and $2 subscription and $4 subscription and $4 su

25 White Dove Hidden Name Card Samples and 100 NewScrap Pictures, Sc. S. M. Foote, Northford, Co.

MUSIC the PIANO AND ORGAN with-out PIANO AND ORGAN the aid of a teacher by using Soper's Instantaneous Guide to the keys. No previous knowledge of music whatever required. Send for book of testimonials. FREE. Address SOPER MUSIC CO., Box 1487, NEW YORK, N.Y.

1 Stone Ring, 1 Plain Ring, 125 Carda & Pictures, Fringe Hidden Name &c., 155 Games, Songs and Agt's Book of 30 cards, 10c. IVY CARD Co., Clintonville, Conn. 50 CHROMO or 25 All Hidden Name CARDS, 16c, Sample Book 4c, Crown Ptg. Co., Northford, Ct.

25 FLORAL, CARDS 1 AUTOGRAPH ALBUM, 300 Games, Recipes, Sample Cards, Fictures, Ring and Book, 10c. T Card Co., Clistonville, Cons.

Odorless Frying-pan,

Warranted to cook ONIONS, Beefsteak, etc., without any smell or fumes escaping in the room. Liberal inducements: selfs at skirk. Agents wanted. MORGAN MFG. CO., Krainskoo, Mich.

2 all hidden name and Silk Fringe Cards, with 2 at page sample book, locis, 40 mixed, and Solic Silver Ring, 20cis, Clinton Bros., Clintonville, Conn. SEE HERE! Why not save one half on 1000 useful articles? Send for Catalogue, Big pay to agents. CHICAGO SCALE CO., Chicago, Ill.

LADY AGENTS clear 1150 mouthly, selling our Celebrated MADAME DEAN'S SPINAL SUPPORT. ING CORSETS. Dilustrated catalogus territory given. Illustrated catalogus.

LE FREE to Agents.

LEWIS SCHIELE & CO.,

250 Broadway, New York. o experience required. Exclusive illustrated catalogue free. $3 SAM

HELP WANTED. 125 a week and expenses paid, Steady work, New goods, Samules free J.F. HILLA CO. Augusta. Me.

You can live at home and make more money at work for us than at anything else in the world. Either sex all ages. Cost-segs. Terms FREE. Address. TRUE & Co., Augusta, Maine inventor of the celebrated GOSSAN &R VEN TILATING WIG and ELASTIC BAND TOUPRES.

Instructions to enable Ladies and Gentlemen to measure their own heads with accuracy:
FOR WIGS, INCHES.
No. 1, The round of the head.
No. 2. From forehead over the head to neck.
No. 3. From ear to ear over the top.
No. 4. From ear to ear round the forehead.
No. 2. Over forehead as far as required.
No. 3. Over the crown of the head.

head,
No. 2. From forehead over the head to neck.
No. 3. From ear to ear over the top.
No. 4. From ear to ear round the forehead.
He has always ready for sale a splendid Stock of Gents' Wigs, Toupees, Ladies' Wigs, Haif Wigs, Frisettes, Braids, Curis, etc., beautifully manufactured, and as cheap as any establishment in the Union. Letters from any part of the world will receive attention.

WORTH SENDING FOR

Dr. J. H. SCHENCK has published A NEW AND ELABORATE

BOOK on the Treatment and Cure of which will be mailed FREE to all who want it. If you are, or know of any one who is, afflicted with, or liable to any of these diseases, send name and address (plainly written) to

CONSUMPTION, LIVER COMPLAINT AND DYSPEPSIA

Dr. J. H. SCHENCK & SON, (Name this paper.) Philadelphia, Pa.

Kirtland Bros. & Co., 79 Nassau St., New York

A Wonderful Offer FREE Could Teetingies, Fronty Handled Knofe and a Rolled Gold Rong Given You to introduce our New Carella for 'to. Fifty Given You to introduce and Farella for 'to. Fifty Given You Thomas and Teeting County Farella for the County of the Cou ART PRINTING CO., Wallingford, Ct.

CURE THE DEAF
PROCE'S PATENT INFROVED CUSHIONED EAR DRUNK Perfectly Bestore the Hearing, and perform the work of the natural drum. Invisible, comfortable and always in the state of the material
drum. Invisible, comfortable and always in the state of the material
drum. Invisible, on the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the stat

LYDIA E. EGETABL

Ladies of the World.

It will cure entirely the worst form of Female Com-plaints, all Ovarian troubles, Inflammation and Ulcera-tion, Falling and displacements, also spinal Weaktress and is particularly adapted to the Change of Life it will disolve and expel tumors from the uterus in an early stage of development. The tendency to cancerous humors there is checked very speedily by its use. It removes faintness, flatulency, destroys all craving for stimulants, and relieves weakness of the atomach. It cures Bloating, Headaches, Nervous Prostration, General Debility, Sleeplesaness, Depression and Indigestion. That feeling of bearing down, causing pain, weight and backache, is always permanently cured by its use.

It will at all times, and under all circumstances set in harmony with the laws that govern the female system.

For Kidney Complaints of either sex this Compound is nnsurpassed. Correspondence freely answered. Add in confidence LYDIA E. PINKHAM, LYNN, MASS

Lydia E. Pinkham's LIVER PILLS, cure constitution, Miliousness, and torpidity of the liver. 25 cts per box.
——Sold by all Druggists.——

EDUCATIONAL.

PACKER INSTITUTE, BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

Mrs. N. B. De Saussure, for five years Assistant to the Lady Principal at Vassar College, will open the house No. 171 Joralemon Street, for the benefit of young ladies wishing to attend the sessions of the Packer Collegiate Institute, on or after September 15th, 1887.

In addition to the most approved sanitary conditions, and all modern improvements in heating and ventilation, the house presents superior advantages of location, being directly opposite the Institute, and within a few minutes walk of the Academy of Music, Historical Society Hall, the Mercantile Library, and leading churches of all denominations.

All household arrangements will be apecially adapted to the maintenance of a quiet, orderly home life, and the furtherance of such arrangements as parents may desire to make for securing to their daughters the musical and literary advantages of the city. Mr. H. E. Arnold, the well known pianist, will conduct the musical education of the young ladies, conduct the musical education of the young ladies, where no other preference exists.

Terms, $500 per year, for board and tuition in any class of the Packer Institute; payable, $500 at the opening of the year, and $200 in the following March. No deductions will be made for absence from any other cause than protracted illness.

Music, practice periods, sittings in church and expenses at laundry, involve extra charges, which will penses of laundry, involve extra charges, which wil in no case exceed cost. Sheets, pillow-cases, blankets and counterpanes furnished by each scholar.

Mrs. De Saussure cites, by permission, the following

T. J. BACKUS, LL. D., Packer Collegiate Institute, REV. EDWARD LATHROP, D. D., Stamford, C., BENSON J. LOSSING LL. B., Dover Plains, N. Y. REV. RYLAND KENDRICK, LL. D., 14 frying Place, N. Y.

MISS ABBY F. GOODSELL, Lady Principal of Vassar College, PROF. MARIA MITCHELL, Vassar College,
PROF. M. B. DWIGHT, Vassar College,
PROF. L. C. COOLEY, Vassar College,
PROF. B. VAN INCEN, Vassar College,
Misses BON SEY and DILLAYE, Ogoniz, Pa.
REV. C. H. HALL, D. D. J. T. Montague at, Brooklyn, PROF. ROB'T R. RAYMON D. 123 Henry at, Brooklyn,
Mr. W.M. THAW, Pittsburgh, Pa. Mr. W.M. THAW. Pittsbirgh, Pa. How. W.ADE HAMPTON, Washington, D. C. Mr. W. P. HALLIDAY, Ostro, Ph. Mr. H. L. HALLIDAY, Calro, III. Sin, F. J. PELZER, Charlestown, South Carolina.

ONE PACK May 1011 Brown Carle, One Pack Facer Carle, One Pack Principles hash, One Pack Hall on One I, you hade, The Myses that he can be subjected to the Carle C 941 HIDDEN NAME CARDS, et al. printeres, pri

The Very Best Present

You can make a friend is a year's

The Saturday Evening Post.

It will cost you but ONE DOLLAR in addition to your own subscription of Two DOLLARS.

she cast one WE SEND TWO COPIES ONE YEAR in It was all FOR THREE DOLLARS.

plan of mine, sug-

ued, "Will you go your your dislikes."

Latest Fashion Phases.

Plain black with very little ornamentation is the strict Lenten gown for the lair ones who go from one extreme to the other. They have danced and frolicked and worn gorgeous array for three or lour months, and now must do penance.

It is said that the spring fashions will be remarkably rational. It is to be hoped that this will prove true. The skirts of dresses are to be scarcely draped at all. Very many will wear the plain round skirt.

Colored cloth will be quite the favored material, so thick, soft and smooth and shining as to resemble thick silk, and its lights and shades so harmonious as to reall the most beautiful glace plushes and velvets. This fine cloth clings closely to the figure, fitting like a glove, drapes beautifully, and will certainly be the success of the spring season. Many fancy woolen materials are attempting to rival it, but without success. Some, however, are exceedingly pretty.

A new style of vigogne has hairy stripes like fur. It makes excellent skirts, but cannot be used for tunics, for it is too tnick and stiff for drapery.

Braiding looks remarkably well upon cloth. Very rich costumes and mantles are obtained by braiding a close pattern in in black over cloth of eitner a bright or light amber. With braided cloth fancy tissues striped with silk, plush or velvet are combined with great effect. The new Medici velvets are charming, orming wide stripes, some plain, others speckled in various colors. So are the phosphorescent moire velvets lovely with their brilliant changeful tints glinting sunshine on the crest of dancing waves.

Moire silks are also used much as underskirts, with tunics of cashmere, veiling or Sicilienne. A great success is the dolman cloth, which is covered with a pattern in relief simulating braid. This pattern, or rather this imitation of braiding, is formed of a sort of frizzy velvet over a plain ground. Very pretty jackets are made of this new style of cloth.

Elegant jackets are made of colored cloth, hussar blue, military red, capucine or snuff-colored. They are lined with silk to match, and trimmed with gold or silver braid.

The trotteur, or short costume for morning walks or shopping, is chiefly made of fancy-checked cloth of various shades of brown, with streaks of bright red, blue and yellow. The skirt has one deep plaited flounce, with stitched heading and short drapery. The amazon bodice, close and clinging, comes down a few inches below the waist and is buttoned down the front. The out-of-door jacket of the same material is lined throughout with fancy striped selk. It is tight-fitting at the back, with loose front; the neck is finished with a turn-down velvet collar and revers, and it is fastened with one double button only.

Costumes of plain cloth or cashmere have the skirt draped up at the side over a wide panel in braid work. The close-fitting amszon bodice has a narrow plaited plastron braided to match. More simple and less expensive costumes have the self-colored skirt or tunic draped over a striped underskirt. The striped material is also used for trimming the bodice and sleeves.

Bodices of red faille or surah, finely platted on to a plain shoulder-piece and fastened around the waist with a belt, are very fashionable for young ladies to wear with various skirts. It is called the Odette bodice.

The variety in hats and bonnets this season has never been exceeded. They run through wondrous grades of diminutive, medium, large, immense and grotesque sizes, and individual taste has unlimited scope, for there is much to choose from in the way of style, shape and adornment. The very popular "Peek-a-boo" bonnets grade from a tiny coquettish shape, having a little pent-house brim, to an exaggerated style like the old-tashioned caleche bonnet, suggestive of the grotesque head-dress worn by "Buttercup," of "Pinafore" fame. This large model is this season trimmed from the back of the hat, and there is frequently no garniture on the front except the wide band that surrounds the crown.

ere are also innumerable styles in the tain, cottage, princess and other close and a bonnets, which are invariably in ha, y women of elegant tastes.

digestiond hats are the Bismarck, the cheerfulnthe Vivandiere, the Leonardo —herwise called the Gainsbor-Warner Sulanger, the Princess of ulates the Reg. ge, elegant Jacques Collargest bottle usually made of black or golden-brown velvet.

Cure. Sold by all hat is completely cov-

Among the trimmed hats exhibited, is one in this style made of shot or cauchemar (black with terra cotta reflets) velvet, trimmed with gold lace and glittering jeweled pins, another with canaque or Caledonian plush adorned with sea birds. Another altogether different style, with a crushed-in crown and an upturned brim, is made of black velvet corded with scarlet. Around the crown is set a wreath of crimson velvet unmounted roses. A second hat of this shape is trimmed with garnet scarabs, mounted in gold, nestling in torsades of openwork silk etamine in broche patterns.

High English felt hats, with brims rolling close to the crown, called the Torquay and the Brighton, are severely plain in the matter of garniture, there being but two gray quill-teathers thrust through a stiff-repped ribbon bow at the left side. These hats are worn with tailor suits, and the cloth caps in jockey style are worn en suite with long coats closely fitted, made of plain, checked, or striped tweed, and trimmed with black fox or beaver. The caps are not decorated in any way.

Glossy beaver hats with velvet brins, are trimmed with Roman scarfs, shot velvet, or bronze and silver ornaments, mingled with loops of heavy moire ribbon.

Bonnets made of gray embroidery, silver, gold, steel or jet passementerie, are worn at the theatre. Small they are and perched up high on the head. They always have strings, which are tied under the chin or in a long bow pinned up tight on each side with all sorts of jewels. These bonnets are worn with the most elaborate and gayest open-neck evening dresses. Bonnets are discarded only for grand opers.

Feather tans rule the breeze. They are either gray or black tortoise shell.

Tea gowns of pale corn-colored or sang de bouf China silk very much draped with black Spanish lace or Chantilly net are in high vogue. The brilliant shade of red thus veiled renders the grown becoming to both blonde and brunette.

Some of the new very elegant and expensive sash-ribbons are made into pretty fichus that cover the waist and shoulders almost entirely. The Persian brocaded sash-ribbons thus arranged much resemble the kerchiefs of the Swiss peasantry, only they are of rich silk instead of cotton. The sash is laid in close plaits on the shoulders, brought down and crossed below the chest in front, finishing with a large buckle that holds the ends. In the back there are loops and long ends falling from the fichu.

Some very lovely luncheon and teagowns for summer wear are already on exhibition. These are made of China silks figured with small but gay Watteau designs, flower-striped India silk muslins, real French-challies as fine and sheer as the most expensive veilings, and also soft-finished failies in plain shades of primrose, cresson green, mauve, apricot, tea rose, cafe an lait, silver, tawn, bebe, blue or pale golden terra-cotta with olive accessories. These are fashioned in princess style and open broadly over petticoats of Persian silk net.

Stripes of every style, color and description still hold high place in the world of dress. More than this, they appear to constitute a typical peculiarity of the forthcoming modes for spring. Much of the ingenuity of the modiste is expended upon their novel distribution and in studying the best manner in which to vary familiar effects. One change is obtained by forming the stripes into a series of points on the front of the skirt, with perpendicular stripes at each side, with kilts of plain goods alternating. This method is effective without being intricate.

Odds and Ends.

NOVELTIES IN DECORATIONS.
[Concluded.]

An "ivory" room or hall is very fashionable and not difficult to arrange. White enamelling has been in vogue for some little time, but the new tim is more creamy.
The old ivory Japanese paper is used for panels, jambs of mantel shelves and dado.
Sometimes the floor is enamelled old ivory, and has rugs and small carpets of Oriental make laid on it. For summer and the country this has all a beautiful cool, clear appearance, but for winter and towns, what shall we say? But there is nothing like trying.

Screens, with white frames, for holding autotypes, etc., are often panelled with delicate old world-looking brocade of white, pale pink, and pale blue. A collection of Bartolozzi engravings are worthily set off in this coloring, though they also look extremely well in olive-green or deep terra cotta.

An effective way of framing photographs of places, groups, or pictures is to cut a frame in cardboard, with a margin of three inches; cover it with velveteen by cutting it half an inch wider all round, turning over the edges, and glueing them down at the back. Then take another place of cardboard, paste on a piece of satin paper, such as blotting covers are lined with, on one side, and some cheap material on the other, and glue the two pieces of cardboard together except at the top, where the photo slips in, pressing them under a heavy weight for some time.

The second piece of cardboard forms the back of the frame, so, of course, has no aperture cut in it. The white satin piper side shows when no photograph is in the frame, as in an ordinary bought one. Two gilt rings must be sewn on to the back, to suspend the frame, or a tolerably wide ribbon can be added, with a bow. These frames are quickly and inexpensively made, can be adapted to any sized productions at home or when trayeling. Glass can be added if wished, hy glueing it to the back of the velveteen covered piece of cardboard, and adding a slip of paper all round to secure it, then fastening the whole together and well pressing it. But these frames are more useful without glass. Liquid glue is the best to use.

Imitation hatchets, or tomahawks, made in wood, with the handles covered with plush, and four (or more) gilt hooks fixed in, are novelties for holding keys. They are suspended by a ribbon tied round the two ends of the handle. Any bandy carpenter will make the hatchets, from a design, or sight of an original one.

Kettledrum tables are novel for tea in drawing-rooms; they are in imitation of the military drum.

Garden baskets of wood can be most effectively ornamented with leather work, and afterwards painted brown and varnished; they look exactly like carved oak; a spray of flowers ornaments the sides and leaves and tendrils are carried over the stalk.

Many ladies still do the work, so may like to know of this adaptation of it. We allude to the wooden baskets of a long shape, with rounded ends and handles, sold at toy shops for children's seaside use and for garden use.

Drain pipes, painted some color, with enamel paint, stand in the corners of some rooms, with river grasses and bulrushes arranged in them, reaching to the ceiling and graduated in height. An erection of this kind recently caught my eye, in a country drawing-room, and measured eight feet in height. The hostess had been nearly all the morning at work at it, and put in each stalk separately; the housemaid was not allowed to touch it, except at distant periods, when a dusting was considered absolutely necessary.

At a dance, recently given, the temporary ball-room was made attractive by a deep dado of rich brick-red patterned art muslin, looped up at distances by palm leaf fans, put sideways, with the handles slanting downwards. The mantelshelf and door were decorated to match. The palm-leaf fans were alternately self-colored and painted brick-red.

Sprays of ivy were trailed over the drapery of the mantelshelf and over the door. The fans on the mantelshelf had satin bows tied round the handles. A quaint fancy is to buy a quantity of Japanese paper fans with bamboo nandles, paint them different colors and arrange them on a shelf at the top of the dado running round a room. They are placed at some little distance from each other, among photos and pattery, and, if well narmonized, are bright and effective in an ordinary-sized room. They are much used now for catching up the cheap art muslin hangings for impromptu entertainments.

QUARRELS .- What absurd little things people quarrel about! What trivial matters cause ill-feeling in families! The mutton being roasted too little or the beef too much, an opinion about the temperature of the house or the style of curtains that ought to be bought for the front windows. the definition of a word or its pronunciation, are not topics worth a quarrel when peace and good will are of so much importonce in the home. A little ill-feeling is like a little seed that may grow into a large tree which will shadow the whole house. Many a man and woman must look back with regret on the hasty word or the cold repreach which was the entering wedge that split a household in two; and yet how new make a point of uttering the soft word that turneth away wrath!

Confidential Correspondents.

Iowa.—We know nothing of the firm you mention.

BEST.—There is no anthracite coal mined in Canada. The Pennsylvania anthracite coal fields are the most extensive in the world.

R. E. A.—"Near-side" means the left side; "off-side" the right side. The expressions were no doubt suggested by the circumstance that a horse is mounted from the left side, which is then the near-side.

DOUBLEDGE.—Jurors are selected by lot, There is no way of explaining why it is that one person's name may be drawn several times while another is not drawn at all. Lotteries are proverbially uncertain.

SUTLER.—Send to some dealer in old coins. We do not give the address of business houses in this column. If you know of no such dealer, send a postal to us addressed to yourself, and we will give you the needed information.

SAM.—You are highly complimentary in crediting us with knowing all about the mysteries of the conjurer's art. We greatly regret that we cannot justify your high estimate of our acquirements, but we never professed to know everything.

HARRY.—If you have good imitative powers, it is, no doubt, possible for you to become a ventriloquist, after reading one of the books you mention. Ventriloquism is simply a trick, and does not depend upon any peculiarity in the vocal organs.

JOHN B.—Your sight is evidently weak, as evidenced by the aching when exposed to strong light, the weakness of the eyes when used for a lengthened period, and especially the fact that your troubles are increasing. You had better have proper glasses fitted without delay, and, if possible, under the supervision of an oculist.

BUFFALO,—In some cases smoking is no doubt an injurious habit. But it should be condemned with discrimination. There are cases, we believe, in which a strictly moderate use of tobacco is beneficial. Asthmatic persons, for instance, get relief from it, and a single pipe at night after mental exertion has the effect of soothing the brain and preparing it for sleep. You may also urge, in your debate, that smoking does some physical good by saving people with no minds from ennul, and by assisting people with minds to give their brains rest.

LINSEY.—"Volapuk," meaning "world's language," is a system devised by M. Schloyer, a German polygiot. The roots of the words have been borrowed from all the languages of Europe, but principally from the English and German. Each letter has but one and the same sound, words are always written as they are pronounced and pronounced as they are written, and the accent is always put on the last syllable. The grammar has only a single conjugation, no artificial genders and no irregular verbs. There are many disciples of Volapukin Europe and this country.

ECCLES.—An Agnostic is literally one who does not know, that is, one who believes that we have no faculties for determining the existence of an unseen world, or of beings higher than man. There may be, he holds, such a world and such beings, but their existence cannot be proved. The word "theirt" is used in two different senses—to differentiate from an atheist one who believes in God, and to distinguish one who believes in God, but relects all the supernatural elements of Christianity, from the ordinary Christian. Secularism is a system which bases morality purely upon nature, apart altogether from religious sanctions, which are regarded as fictitious.

EYE-KEY.—The illusion you speak of 18 commonly known as the speaking head or sphinx, and is really very simple. A table with three legs placed at equal distances, so that they form an exact triangle, is required. Two sheets of looking-glass are inserted between the legs so that they fill up the entire space. The table is then placed on a slight dais or platform, with the central leg fronting the audience. The mirrors only reflect objects at the plane of their angles, and if the side curtains are of the same color as those at the back of the table, it is obvious that the reflection only is seen in such a position as togive the impression that there is nothing under the table. The confederate is concealed behind the mirrors, who places his head in a mysterious box or part of his body through an opening made in the table top, which is carefully nidden by folds of drapery or a hollow pedestal.

A, J. P.—The Princeites were the followers of Henry James Prince, an Evangelical ctergyman, born in 1811, who about 1840 established a sect which believed that he was the personification of the Third Person in the Trinity, and that this was the beginning of a new dispension to supersede that of Christ. Prince studied at Lampeter College, England, and after his licence to preach had been twice withdrawn—in Somersetshire and in Suffolk—his Lampeter Friends met together at Swansea, and founded at Weymouth a community calling themselves the Agapemone, or Abode of Love. Many rich ladies joined the sect, and Prince became possessed of great wealth, with which he and his followers lived in luxury, making no attempt to gain fresh converts. There were gross moral scandals in connection with the man, having reference to preten-lons too revolting for statement in a living language.

Bolwer.—The reference is to the Iron Crown. During the Middle Ages this was the subject of much interest and superstition. It was a crown of gold, having inside it a ring of iron, which was said to have been forged from the nails of Christ's cross, and it was made by order of Princess Theodelinds from her husband, Agliulf, King of the Lombards, in the year 591. The crown was afterwards given by the queen to the church at Monza. Charlemagne used this iron crown at the ceremony of his coronation, and after him all the emperors who were also kings of Lombardy made similar use of it. Napoleon I., it is said, when at Milan in 1805, put this crown on his head, saying, "God has given it to me; wee to him who shall touch it." The "Great Woodman of Europe," as Victor Hugo called Napoleon, founded the Order of the Iron Crown, which still exists in Anstria. It fell into discuss after Napoleon's time, but was revived by Francis I. in 1816, and is now regarded as a high honor in Austria. The Iron Crown was taken by the Austrians to Vienna in 1859, but was presented to the King of Italy in 1866, and is now among the royal treasures in Naples.